Judicial specialisation in a generalist jurisdiction: Is commercial specialisation within the High Court justified?

Laws 522: The Judiciary

Submitted for the LLB (Honours) Degree

Faculty of Law
Victoria University of Wellington

2014
In November 2013, after a series of Law Commission reports and years of academic, professional and judicial discussion, the government introduced legislation to Parliament to replace the existing High Court commercial list with a specialist commercial panel. Whilst this panel would bring New Zealand into line with many comparable common law jurisdictions, this paper argues that the case for specialisation has not been established. In particular, it notes that there is no publically available evidence to support the claim that the High Court is losing its commercial jurisdiction, or that commercial parties are choosing to resolve their disputes offshore or through alternative dispute resolution. Accordingly, this paper argues that future research by the Law Commission, or other research agency, is required before specialisation can be justified. In reaching this conclusion it also examines the issues that may arise if the government decides to continue with its proposed reform under clause 18 of the Judicature Modernisation Bill 2013, suggesting changes along the way.

Key topics: Judicial specialisation, High Court, Alternative Dispute Resolution, Commercial Litigation.
Table of Contents

I  Introduction.......................................................................................................................... 5

II  The perceived problem ....................................................................................................... 5
   A  The underlying issues........................................................................................................ 6
      1  Failure to identify the correct facts .............................................................................. 6
      2  Incorrect application of the law .................................................................................. 8
   B  How is this a problem? ..................................................................................................... 10
      1  Increasing use of ADR ............................................................................................... 11
      2  Offshore litigation ...................................................................................................... 13
   C  Summary......................................................................................................................... 14

III  Does perception match reality? .......................................................................................... 14
   A  What is a “commercial case”? ...................................................................................... 15
   B  Has there been a decline in commercial litigation? ..................................................... 17
      1  High Court proceedings ............................................................................................. 17
      2  District Court proceedings ......................................................................................... 19
   C  Has there been an upsurge in ADR’s popularity? .......................................................... 21

IV  Where to from here? ........................................................................................................... 24
   A  Seek and they shall come ............................................................................................... 24
   B  A more principled approach .......................................................................................... 24
      1  Loss of the High Court’s commercial jurisdiction ...................................................... 25
      2  The ‘lost’ cases are being resolved offshore or in ADR ............................................. 27
      3  Link between ADR and judicial specialisation .......................................................... 27
      4  Summary .................................................................................................................... 28

V  Specialisation Overseas ........................................................................................................ 29
   A  England ......................................................................................................................... 29
   B  Australia ....................................................................................................................... 32
      1  Federal Court of Australia .......................................................................................... 32
      2  New South Wales ...................................................................................................... 34
   C  Singapore ..................................................................................................................... 36
   D  Cayman Islands ............................................................................................................ 39
   E  Summary ....................................................................................................................... 41

VI  The potential effects of specialisation in New Zealand ................................................... 42
   A  General advantages and disadvantages of specialisation ........................................... 42
      1  Advantages offered by specialisation ......................................................................... 42
      2  Disadvantages of specialisation ................................................................................ 43
   B  Further considerations .................................................................................................. 45

VII  The Judicature Modernisation Bill ................................................................................. 47
   A  Law Commission report ............................................................................................... 47
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1 The rationale for change</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1 Commercial panels</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2 Lack of recommendations</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>B The Judicature Modernisation Bill</td>
<td>52</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VIII Issues</td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>A Judicial independence</td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1 Judicial hierarchy</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2 Concentration of power</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3 Judicial tenure</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>B Panel packing</td>
<td>57</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1 Panel packing within the panel</td>
<td>57</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2 Manipulation outside the commercial panel</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3 Solution</td>
<td>60</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IX Conclusion</td>
<td>61</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>X Bibliography</td>
<td>63</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The text of this paper (excluding footnotes, table of contents, legislation, tables, graphs and the bibliography) comprises 14,998 words.
JUDICIAL SPECIALISATION IN A GENERALIST JURISDICTION

I Introduction

Judicial specialisation is a vexed, complicated, and highly contentious issue. On the one hand, several experienced practitioners have strongly advocated moving towards increased High Court specialisation. On the other hand, many of the senior courts’ judges have rallied against this proposal, vigorously defending their right to exercise all of the High Court’s jurisdiction regardless of their pre-bench experience. Unfortunately, much of the debate has centred on perception and intuition, rather than empirical analysis. The purpose of this paper is to place the dispute in context, providing a thorough discussion of the contentious issues involved.

Beginning with an analysis of the perceived problem, this paper notes that practitioners’ concerns with the current system are multi-faceted, ranging from the judiciary’s ability to develop New Zealand’s commercial law to the rising use of alternative dispute resolution (ADR). Whilst these concerns are frequently cited, practitioners fail to provide concrete evidence to support their contentions. Nor, as this paper reveals, does this evidence exist. As a result, this paper suggests the future steps which law reform bodies such as the Law Commission or the Ministry of Justice should take.

Assuming that further research confirms practitioners’ concerns with the current system, this paper considers other countries’ use of specialist courts and judges, observing that commercial specialisation is present in both large and small jurisdictions. This paper then briefly considers the potential effects specialisation may have within New Zealand, before addressing the numerous concerns with the government’s current proposals for reform in the Judicature Modernisation Bill 2013.

II The perceived problem

For New Zealand’s civil justice system to flourish, it must enjoy the commercial community’s confidence and respect. Decisions need to accord with business common sense, and the standard of judicial reasoning must be high. If not, parties will seek to resolve their disputes elsewhere, depriving High Court judges of the opportunity to shape and develop New Zealand’s commercial law.

1 Alan Galbraith “Facilitating and Regulating Commerce – The Court Process” (2002) 33 VUWLR 419 at 422; Ivor Richardson “What Can Commercial Lawyers Expect of a Legal System?” (1998) 4 NZBLQ 128 at 133; and John Katz “Access to Justice from the Perspective of the Commercial Community: Judicial Specialisation” (2012) 18 Auckland U L Rev 37 at 38. See also Robert Goff “Commercial Contracts and the Commercial Court” [1984] LMCLQ 382 at 382 where his Lordship famously stated that “[J]udges are there to help businessmen, not to hinder them: we are there to give effect to their transactions, not frustrate them: we are there to oil the wheels of commerce, not to put a spanner in the works, or even grit in the oil.”

Unfortunately, if one is to believe the writings of several critics, New Zealand’s lack of High Court specialisation represents an “acute problem”, posing a significant threat to the commercial community’s “access to justice”. Their views, and the alleged consequences of this lack of specialisation, are outlined below.

A The underlying issues

Underpinning several practitioners’ (and some judges’) concerns with the current system is the belief that generalist judges may be unable to grasp the factual and legal nuances of many commercial disputes, leading to inadequate decisions and unwanted appeals.

1 Failure to identify the correct facts

One of the main problems associated with the High Court’s lack of commercial specialisation is the risk of trial court judges making incorrect findings of fact. Under New Zealand’s common law system, appellate courts almost always defer to the High Court judge’s impression of witnesses and decisions based on the evidence placed before him or her. Accordingly, litigants must be confident of the generalist judge’s ability to draw the correct inferences from the evidence placed before the Court, otherwise they will begin to look elsewhere.

This is particularly important in highly technical fact-based areas of the law. Take, for example, a complex multilateral finance or intellectual property dispute. In many

---

2 Tony Molloy and Toby Graham “Trust Jurisdictions: the Path from Incipience to Refulgence” (2010) 16 Trusts & Trustees 116 at 120.
3 Katz, above n 1, at 41.
4 Rae v International Insurance Brokers (Nelson Marlborough) Ltd [1998] 3 NZLR 190 (CA) at 198. See also Viscount Haldane LC’s statement in Nocton v Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932 (HL) at 957 “…it is only in exceptional circumstances that judges of appeal, who have not seen the witness in the box, ought to differ from the finding of fact of the judge who tried the case as to the state of mind of the witness.” (emphasis added).
5 Katz, above n 1, at 41.
6 See, for example, Michael R Baye and Joshua D Wright “Is Antitrust Too Complicated for Generalist Judges? The Impact of Economic Complexity and Judicial Training on Appeals” (2011) 54 Journal of Law and Economics 1 at 4; and Richard A Posner “The Law and Economics of the Economic Expert Witness” (1999) 13 Journal of Economic Perspectives 91 at 96 “…econometrics is such a difficult subject that it is unrealistic to expect the average judge or juror to be able to understand all the situations, these cases will be won or lost depending on whether the judge understands the evidence in dispute. Yet, what an expert considers to be “everyday bread and butter … may well be a minefield” for a non-specialist judge.

The result, according to critics, is that generalist judges may feel the need to take ‘crash’ courses at university, or request additional background information from counsel or expert witnesses. But in both situations, trials are likely to become more drawn out, and hence, more expensive. This is neither fair on the judges, “who may have no aptitude or interest in the topic”, nor the parties, who bear the expense of educating the judge. More worryingly, as Baragwanath J argued extra-judicially, it is a breach of “natural justice” if judges fail to understand the case pre-trial, leaving them incapable of “[posing] questions to witnesses and counsel during the hearing.”

This is not an idle concern for many practitioners. Whereas appellate courts will readily overturn a trial court judge’s incorrect application of the law, they “will not reverse a factual finding unless compelling grounds are shown for doing so.” The option to appeal, therefore, may be of cold comfort to those litigants whose issue is with the judge’s findings of fact, rather than his or her application of the law.

criticisms of an econometric study, no matter how skilful the econometrician is in explaining a study to a lay audience.”

9 Katz, above n 1, at 41. This is not a new phenomenon. For example, in 1911, Learned Hand J stated that: “I cannot stop without calling attention to the extraordinary condition of the law which makes it possible for a man without any knowledge of even the rudiments of chemistry to pass upon such questions are these … How long shall we continue to blunder along …?” see Parke-Davis & Co v H K Mulford & Co 189 F 95, 115 (SDNY, 1911).

10 See, for example, the House of Lords’ decision to attend a 2-day chemistry seminar at Oxford University in Kirin-Amgen Inc v Hoechst Marion Roussel Ltd [2005] 1 All ER 667 (HL) at [135].

11 For example, Baragwanath, above n 7, at 210; Glazebrook, above n 7, at 537; and Richard Southwell “A Specialist Commercial Court in Singapore” (1990) 2 SAc LJ 274 at 275. See also Katz, above n 1, at 39.

12 Baragwanath, above n 7, at 210.

13 For example, Baragwanath, above n 7, at 210.

14 Baragwanath, above n 7, at 211.

15 Rae v International Insurance Brokers (Nelson Marlborough) Ltd, above n 4, at 198 per Tipping J.
2 Incorrect application of the law

Nevertheless, the generalist judge’s (in)ability to make correct findings of fact forms only part of the problem according to critics of the current system. If the resulting judgment fails to accord with business common sense, or lacks detailed reasons for its conclusion, commercial parties are unlikely to view the domestic courts with confidence.¹⁶

Unfortunately, critics routinely identify generalist decisions that are said to fail this basic standard.¹⁷ For example, in 2011, a dispute regarding the interpretation of a bond, entered into between the parties pursuant to a ship-building contract, was appealed from the English Commercial Court to the Court of Appeal. At stake was a claim worth US$46,620,000 plus interest.¹⁸ With Patten LJ and Sir Simon Tuckey coming to different conclusions, Lord Justice Thorpe had the casting vote. In a one paragraph opinion, Thorpe LJ (a family court judge) commenced his reasoning as follows:¹⁹

I find myself in the invidious position of expressing a decisive opinion in a field that is completely foreign. With considerable trepidation I support the judgment of Patten LJ …

Clearly, this statement is unlikely to engender confidence in the judiciary.²⁰ Indeed, the case’s subsequent progression to the United Kingdom’s Supreme Court further reinforced many practitioners’ perception of non-specialist judges being unsuitable for deciding commercial disputes. Delivering the Court’s unanimous judgment, Lord

---

¹⁶ See generally Galbraith, above n 1.
¹⁷ For example, Galbraith, above n 1, at 427 trenchantly criticised the Court of Appeal’s decision in Benjamin Developments v Jones [1994] 3 NZLR 189 (CA) stating that “[t]he case illustrates that the judges that made up that particular Court of Appeal were not prepared to subsume their view to that of market participants. In my opinion, they were wrong. Whatever expertise the members of that court had in commercial law is not the same as the expertise or experience that the market participants had in the actual marketplace …”. See also Tony Molloy “New Zealand: Cuckoos in the nest in an otherwise promising trust and investment jurisdiction” 201 Offshore Investment 19 at 21 who comments on a series of “silly decisions” in New Zealand trust law.
¹⁹ Rainy Sky v Kookmin Bank at [2010] EWCA Civ 582 at [53].
²⁰ For example, Mark Humphries, former head of advocacy at Linklaters in London, noted in “Choosing the Right Judges” (7 July 2011) Law Society Gazette <www.lawgazette.co.uk> “… can it be right that an appeal from a Commercial Court judgment is ultimately decided by a judge whose expertise is largely confined to family law? … At the very least, the public is entitled to expect that the law will be administered by those who have sufficient expertise.”
Clarke dramatically overturned the Court of Appeal’s decision, stating that it led to a “surprising and uncommercial result”\(^\text{21}\) and “defies commercial common sense.”\(^\text{22}\)

Admittedly, this example involves an appellate, rather than a trial, court decision from a different jurisdiction. Nevertheless, it provides a stark example of a judge who is out of his depth. And it is this risk which causes significant concern amongst senior practitioners.\(^\text{23}\)

Significantly, this unease is not unique to barristers and their clients. Indeed, it is a view often shared by judges.\(^\text{24}\) In 2009, New Zealand’s Attorney-General, Chris Finlayson, recounted Sir Hugh Laddie’s experience as an English High Court judge as persuading him that increased judicial specialisation was required.\(^\text{25}\) In 2005, Sir Hugh Laddie took the almost unprecedented step of resigning his judicial commission. His reasons for doing so were illuminating. Amongst other ‘gripes’,\(^\text{26}\) he expressed serious concern at the prospect of hearing cases outside his experience, stating that “it was challenging – like high wire walking – but I didn’t think it was fair for clients to be learning at their expense.”\(^\text{27}\) As Finlayson noted:\(^\text{28}\)

…”this made me think that if someone like Sir Hugh [whom he had previously described as being ‘one of the most impressive lawyers I have ever met’] could be lost to the bench due to his fear he lacked experience in some areas, then we have to ask ourselves ‘what about others?’”

Finally, there is a widespread view that specialisation at the bar should result in specialisation at the bench.\(^\text{29}\) Since at least 1978, lawyers have become increasingly specialised, often advertising themselves to potential clients on the basis of their

\(^{23}\) See, for example, Baragwanath, above n 7, at 210; Katz, above n 1, at 41; Molloy, above n 17, at 21; and Humphries, above n 20.

\(^{24}\) See, for instance, Warren Burger’s statements in ‘Using Arbitration to Achieve Justice (1985) 50 Arb J 3 at 6. See also David Williams QC, former High Court Judge, who observed that “the commercial community [in New Zealand] is bailing out of civil litigation [because of] … ‘continuing long run unhappiness’ with the [apparent] refusal to let judges specialise in either commercial or criminal matters” cited by Molloy, above n 17, at 22.

\(^{26}\) In particular, “[h]e blamed a lack of stimulation [and] the isolation of the job”. See “Obituary of Professor Sir Hugh Laddie” The Telegraph (online ed, London, 3 December 2008).

\(^{27}\) “Obituary of Professor Sir Hugh Laddie” The Telegraph (online ed, London, 3 December 2008).

\(^{28}\) Finlayson, above n 25.

\(^{29}\) For example Katz, above n 1, at 39; and Galbraith, above n 1, at 423.
expertise, or knowledge of a particular area of the law. Indeed, the notion that lawyers cannot be expected to be experts in all areas of the law has now been codified in the Lawyers: Conduct and Client Care Rules 2008. As critics emphasise, if commercial parties do not expect lawyers to be generalists, how can they expect judges to become experts in the multitude of cases that come before them?

B How is this a problem?

A lack of judicial specialisation does not pose a direct threat to New Zealand’s judicial system. Taken as a whole, the number of wayward decisions by generalist judges is likely to be a relatively small percentage of the overall number of High Court decisions. Instead, the damage, according to critics, comes from the reluctance of many businesses to take the (albeit low) risk of a generalist judge coming to the ‘wrong’ legal conclusion, or making incorrect findings of fact.

This poses a substantial threat because, as a common law jurisdiction, New Zealand depends upon a steady flow of litigation to develop, refine and adapt its commercial law. According to its detractors, the lack of specialisation threatens this development, as commercial parties choose to resolve their disputes offshore, or through ADR.

---

31 Indeed, r 4.1 of the Lawyers and Conveyancers Act (Lawyers: Conduct and Client Care) Rules 2008 clearly accepts that lawyers cannot be expected to work in all areas of the law, stating that good cause for refusing a request to act includes situations where the “instructions [fall] outside the lawyer’s normal field of practice”.

32 For example Katz, above n 1, at 39; and Galbraith, above n 1, at 423. See also the New Zealand Bar Association’s submission to the Law Commission, which observed that “[s]pecialisation in one form or another is a reality in the modern practice of law and has been for some time now. It is an issue of relevance, not just for legal practitioners and their clients, but also the judiciary.” Cited in Law Commission Review of the Judicature Act 1908: Towards a Consolidated Courts Act (NZLC IP29, 2012) [Law Commission 2012 Issues Paper]. For a contrasting view, see Susy Frankel “Commentary on the Conference Session ‘Regulating and Facilitating Commerce’” (2002) 33 VUWL 813 at 816.

33 See generally Helen Winkelmann, Chief High Court Judge of New Zealand, “ADR and the Civil Justice System” (speech to the Arbitrators’ and Mediators’ Institute of New Zealand, Auckland, 6 August 2011) at 2.

34 Indeed, the New Zealand Law Society recently expressed “[c]oncern about the prospect of the law not being developed and articulated as fully as it might be because of a decline in judgments in commercial cases. This is an issue that is important to the commercial community.” See Law Commission Review of the Judicature Act 1908: Towards a New Courts Act (NZLC R126, 2012) [Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908] at [10.38].
I Increasing use of ADR

Defined broadly, ADR refers to all methods of resolving a dispute other than by recourse to litigation. Whilst this includes processes such as negotiation, conciliation and mini-trials, practitioners have emphasised the (perceived) link between a lack of judicial specialisation, and the rise of arbitration and mediation.

As a form of ‘private litigation’, arbitration (typically) involves a series of adversarial hearings before one (or more) party appointed arbitrators, resulting in a binding arbitral award. Although it offers many potential advantages over litigation, “often the factor which tips the choice towards arbitration”, according to Alan Galbraith QC, “is the ability of the parties to select the arbitrator.” Given the choice between an experienced arbitrator, and the possibility of a judge who “[finds himself] in the invidious position of expressing a decisive opinion in a field that is completely foreign”, it is easy to see why commercial parties (allegedly) opt for arbitration. As Warren Burger, former United States Chief Justice, observed:

My own experience persuades me that in terms of cost, time, and human wear and tear, arbitration is vastly better than conventional litigation for many kinds of cases … I emphasize this because to find precisely the judge whose talents and experience fit a particular case of great complexity is a fortuitous circumstance. This can be made more likely if two intelligent litigants agree to pick their own triers of the issues.

Whilst it is clear that a lack of specialisation provides strong justification for arbitration’s growth, one may argue that it provides little support for mediation’s popularity. To a certain extent this is true. The choice of a mediator is arguably not as important for parties entering into a non-binding process. If the parties cannot find a consensus, they are free to walk away. However, according to practitioners, this simplistic reasoning fails to recognise that an unsuccessful mediation will almost inevitably result in litigation.

As Sir Ivor Richardson wrote, “[j]ustice may be priceless, but it is not costless.” The risk to parties (however misguided) from potential future costs in terms of time, 36 Commercial Law in New Zealand (online looseleaf ed, LexisNexis) at [45.3.1].

37 Galbraith, above n 1, at 421.
38 Rainy Sky v Kookmin Bank [2010] EWCA Civ 582 at [53].
39 Ivory Richardson “Law and Economics” (1998) 4 NZBLQ 64 at 64.
40 Richardson, above n 38, at 64.
expense and appeals resulting from inadequate judicial reasoning forms the backdrop to mediation. As a result, it is suggested that parties face an added impetus to settle upon terms of their choosing, with the help of a specialist mediator, rather than risk the (albeit low) potential vagaries of a generalist judge.

This (perceived) loss of commercial litigation has serious consequences for New Zealand’s economy, and justice system. If ADR’s popularity continues to grow, courts are likely to be faced with fewer civil suits, and less ability to shape future law. Indeed, the New Zealand Law Society recently expressed concern “about the prospect of the law not being developed and articulated as fully as it might be because of a decline in judgments in commercial cases.”

This loss of litigation has the further potential to threaten New Zealand’s economic growth. Businesses and business people value “stability of legal relations and the ability to plan for the future with confidence.” If the underlying legal position is unclear, businesses may be forced to engage in lengthy contractual negotiations in an attempt to limit their litigation risk, or may simply choose not to enter the market. In either situation, the lack of certainty (created by the lack of litigation) introduces unwanted, and undesirable flow-on effects throughout the economy.

Finally, ADR’s popularity may also prove its downfall. Because ADR relies upon court decisions to provide the background legal position, it may struggle to cope with 42 As the Law Commission recently noted “how things present themselves to the business sector is an important intangible element. And there can be little doubt, given the worldwide acceptance of its importance in many jurisdictions, that the actual “availability” – regardless of the numerical impact – of a commercial court or panel is perceived to be of some moment. It is a confidence factor in a particular jurisdiction that is not easily quantified.” Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.60] (emphasis added).

43 This is not an idle concern. In relation to a dwindling number of construction cases, Canada’s Chief Justice noted that: “The construction law tree looks different than it used to. It may not be dead, but new branches are not appearing as often as they once did. And old branches that need pruning are being neglected.” Beverly McLachlin “Judging the ‘Vanishing Trial’ in the Construction Industry” (2010) 5 CLInt 9 at 10. For a New Zealand perspective see Winkelmann, above n 33.
45 Roger Kerr “Commerce, Certainty and the Courts” [1997] NZLJ 361 at 363. See also Richardson, above n 1, at 129 and 133.
46 For an example of parties “negotiating in a fog” of legal uncertainty, leading to protracted and costly negotiations see Telecom Corporation of New Zealand Ltd v Clear Communications Ltd [1995] 1 NZLR 385 (PC). Quote from Clear Communications Ltd v Telecom Corporation of New Zealand Ltd (1992) 5 TCLR 166 (HC) at 219.
new developments if there have been no judicial decisions in the area.\textsuperscript{47} The result, ironically, is that ADR may become uncertain, providing an additional threat to business confidence.\textsuperscript{48}

2 \textit{Offshore litigation}

Unfortunately, practitioners have emphasised that ADR is not the only threat to New Zealand’s commercial litigation. In an increasingly globalised world, New Zealand businesses will often contract with offshore entities, leading to negotiations on a choice of forum clause. The problem, in this regard, as Sir Ivor Richardson observed, is that “[t]he legal procedures of the jurisdiction, including the quality of lawyers and judges will influence forum selection \textit{as much as the substantive law}.”\textsuperscript{49}

Whilst New Zealand undoubtedly has a solid legal system, it is clear that some of our most substantial disputes are now being resolved offshore, under different jurisdictions.\textsuperscript{50} Part of the reason appears to be a lack of judicial specialisation.

In 2010, a leading international journal, \textit{Trusts & Trustees}, whose editorial board includes figures such as Lord Millett, Sir Gavin Lightman and Dr Donovan Waters QC, commissioned an issue on emerging trust jurisdictions, including China, Cyprus, Malta, Russia and, pertinently, New Zealand.\textsuperscript{51} The accompanying editorial does not make for pleasant reading. In the editors’ view: \textsuperscript{52}

\begin{quote}
[T]he acute problem besetting [New Zealand] is a lack of judicial specialization, combined with a high proportion of judges … whose judicial utterances display a serious ineptitude for equity and trust matters.
\end{quote}

\textsuperscript{47} See, for instance, James Allsop “International Commercial Law, Maritime Law and Dispute Resolution: The Place of Australia, New Zealand and the Asia Pacific Region in the Coming Years” (2007) 21 ANZ Mar LJ 1 at 10.

\textsuperscript{48} See Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.61]: “Part of the strategy of the present New Zealand administration is to encourage a growing and vibrant economy. Commercial disputes are necessarily part of any such regime. Efficient and adequate dispute resolution mechanisms are an important support mechanism. So is ‘certainty’ in commercial law. That can only be supplied by the courts. Mediators and arbitrators need to know what the current legal context is in which to assess matters which come before them. In that sense, in-court and out-of-court dispute mechanisms are complementary.” (emphasis added).

\textsuperscript{49} Richardson, above n 1, at 132 (emphasis added).

\textsuperscript{50} For two examples of large commercial disputes that were resolved outside New Zealand’s courts see Danone Asia Pacific Holdings Pte Ltd v Fonterra Co-Operative Group Ltd [2014] NZHC 1681; and Ironsands Investments Ltd v Toward Industries Ltd [2012] NZHC 1277.

\textsuperscript{51} Molloy and Graham, above n 2.

\textsuperscript{52} Molloy and Graham, above n 2, at 120.
Admittedly, this particular editorial was jointly written by Tony Molloy QC, an outspoken critic of New Zealand’s generalist system. Nonetheless, statements such as these represent a significant threat to New Zealand’s legal system. If such criticisms become well known, then offshore parties may become more insistent when negotiating choice of forum clauses. To the extent this occurs, New Zealand stands to lose some of its most significant litigation, with a consequent inability to shape and develop our existing commercial law.

C Summary

According to its detractors, litigation has truly become an option of last resort. Commercial parties’ and their lawyers’ lack of confidence in the ability of generalist judges to grasp the factual and/or legal nuances of many commercial disputes has led to a significant loss of commercial litigation in New Zealand. Where parties have the choice, disputes are primarily resolved through ADR or in offshore courts, threatening the development of New Zealand’s commercial law, and undermining our economic growth. The only solution, for many senior practitioners, is an increase in High Court specialisation.

III Does perception match reality?

However, whilst criticisms of the current system abound, an almost universal feature of these articles and comments is a lack of empirical data to support their claims. Forceful statements are often justified on the basis of personal experience, or discussions with other lawyers or judges. Numerous unnamed “clients” are referred

---

53 Notwithstanding Tony Molloy QC’s obvious bias, this editorial was vigorously defended by Anthony Grant who argued that “… I [do not] think that those who read this article should say that criticism from Trusts and Trustees is merely a criticism from Tony Molloy. It is not. The Editorial comments are jointly authored and are from a legal journal of international repute with an Editorial Board of impeccable quality. That is how readers will interpret them.” See Anthony Grant “How Others See Us: A Need for Judicial Specialisation” (14 May 2010) <www.anthonygrant.com>.

54 For example, Grant, above n 53. See also Galbraith, above n 1, at 421 who argues that “[i]t is important that the New Zealand court system maintains the integrity and confidence of the commercial community in its processes and outcomes, so that New Zealand businesses can argue with confidence that New Zealand is an appropriate legal forum for determining disputes arising out of the international commerce they engage in.”

55 For example, Katz, above n 1, at 38.

56 See, for example, Anthony Grant “Is the High Court’s Civil Jurisdiction in a Death Spiral (part 3)” (2010) 153 NZ Lawyer Magazine 9; Galbraith, above n 1; and Molloy and Graham, above n 2, at 120.

57 See, for instance Galbraith, above n 1, at 422 who justified his comments on the basis of “thirty plus years in litigation, and innumerable conversations with other litigators and with commercial clients.”
The purpose of this section is to examine the available evidence to assess whether the above concerns represent reality, or mere perception. In this regard, there are two main issues. First, what is meant by “commercial cases”? Secondly, has there been a drop-off in commercial litigation, or a substantial increase in the use of ADR?

A What is a “commercial case”?

As a matter of principle, one cannot propose a solution (in this case, increased judicial specialisation) without first identifying a problem. Unfortunately, a distinctive feature of the judicial specialisation debate has been the failure of practitioners and others to define what is, and is not, a “commercial case”. Clearly, this is a problem.

Although a murder case undoubtedly involves criminal law and a contract performance dispute involves commercial law, the distinction is not always clear-cut. Can tax, competition, and now breach of directors’ duties cases, which will often involve some form of criminal element, be considered commercial if all of the evidence before the court concerns the nature of the market or the reasons for entering into a particular transaction? Moreover, how does one classify cases such as Prest v Petrodel Resources Ltd, which, while nominally a family law dispute, involved complex issues about piercing the corporate veil?

New Zealand’s case and statute law provides only limited guidance. In 1986, the government attempted to define the scope of “commercial proceedings” eligible for entry onto the newly established commercial list. The result was a detailed list of proceedings, as set out in s 24B of the Judicature Act 1908. Unfortunately,

58 For example, Anthony Grant “Is the High Court’s Civil Jurisdiction in ‘a Death Spiral?’ (Part 1)” (17 September 2010) <www.anthonygrant.com> stated “I am aware of at least one enterprise that is so mistrustful of our senior courts it will not do business in New Zealand unless the parties it contracts with agree that all disputes will be litigated off-shore. I am also aware of other enterprises that are not willing to do any business in New Zealand because of their lack of confidence in our senior courts.”
59 Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.41].
60 See also Frankel, above n 32, at 816.
61 Prest v Petrodel Resources Ltd and others [2013] UKSC 34, [2013] 2 AC 415.
62 Section 24B of the Judicature Act 1908 defines the commercial list’s jurisdiction as follows:
subsequent judicial interpretation has substantially limited the list’s effectiveness as an all-purpose definition, with the High Court holding that s 24B simply refers to disputes of a sufficiently “commercial flavour”. The problem with this interpretation is that it immediately becomes a subjective exercise, providing little guidance on what is, and is not, considered commercial.

Nor is there an internationally accepted definition. Nevertheless, following the Law Commission’s recent approach, it is sufficient, at this stage, to adopt the English Commercial Court’s approach, which defines a commercial case as any claim relating to:

(1) The classes of proceedings eligible for entry on a commercial list are as follows:
   (a) any proceedings arising out of or otherwise relating to:
      (i) the ordinary transactions of persons engaged in commerce or trade or of shippers:
      (ii) the carriage of goods for the purpose of trade or commerce:
      (iii) the construction of commercial, shipping, or transport documents:
      (iv) the export or import of merchandise:
      (v) insurance, banking, finance, guarantee, commercial agency, or commercial usages:
      (vi) disputes arising out of intellectual property rights between parties engaged in commerce:
   (b) applications to the court under the Arbitration Act 1996:
   (c) appeals against determinations of the Commerce Commission:
   (d) proceedings under any of the provisions of sections 80, 81, 82, and 89 of the Commerce Act 1986:
   (e) cases stated by the Financial Markets Authority, and civil proceedings under the Securities Act 1978 or the Securities Markets Act 1988:
   (f) the following proceedings in relation to companies registered under the Companies Act 1993:
      (i) applications for directions by liquidators and receivers:
      (ii) defended applications under section 174 of the Companies Act 1993:
      (iii) disputes relating to takeovers:
      (iv) disputes between shareholders or classes of shareholders of companies (other than companies having not more than 25 shareholders):
   (g) proceedings of a commercial nature required or permitted to be entered on a commercial list by or under any Act or by or under the High Court Rules or any rules made under section 51C of this Act.

63 Cromwell Corp Ltd v Sofrana Immobilier (NZ) Ltd (1988) 1 PRNZ 352 (HC).
64 One needs to look no further than Wylie J’s statement in Sullivan v Villages of NZ (Pakuranga) Ltd (1990) 3 PRNZ 718 (HC) at 721: “It may be difficult to define the line [between commercial and non-commercial cases] but it should not be difficult to recognise on which side of the line a particular case should fall.”
65 Compare, for example, the definition of commercial proceedings under r 45.1 of the Uniform Civil Procedure Rules 2005 (NSW) and the definition of commercial under art 1(1) of the United Nations Commission on International Trade Model Law on International Commercial Arbitration GA Res 61/33, A/61/17 (1985).
67 Civil Procedure Rules (UK), r 58.1(2).
JUDICIAL SPECIALISATION IN A GENERALIST JURISDICTION

(a) a business document or contract;
(b) the export or import of goods;
(c) the carriage of goods by land, sea, air or pipeline;
(d) the exploitation of oil and gas reserves or other natural resources;
(e) insurance and re-insurance;
(f) banking and financial services;
(g) the operation of markets and exchanges;
(h) the purchase and sale of commodities;
(i) the construction of ships;
(j) business agency; and
(k) arbitration.

B Has there been a decline in commercial litigation?

Having roughly defined what is, and is not, “commercial”, it becomes possible to assess whether there has been a substantial drop-off in the level of commercial litigation, or a large increase in the use of ADR, as one would expect if concerns about judicial specialisation are valid.

1 High Court proceedings

Unfortunately, as the Law Commission recently discovered, it is almost impossible to determine whether the High Court has experienced a decline in the number of commercial proceedings.68

One reason for this is that neither the High Court,69 nor the Ministry of Justice,70 provides detailed breakdowns of the types of claims filed, or the numbers that are disposed of through trial. In general, reports distinguish between criminal trials, criminal appeals, civil proceedings,71 and civil appeals.72 Furthermore, even though

---

68 Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.42].
71 Defined by s 2 of the Judicature Act 1908 as “any proceedings in the court, other than criminal proceedings”.
reports occasionally provide additional breakdowns, distinguishing insolvency claims and judicial review applications from other cases, this provides little to no information as to the underlying nature of the remaining “general proceedings”. As a result, it is almost impossible to identify the number of commercial (rather than civil) claims going before the court, let alone identify the nature of these claims.

This is not the only problem one faces when attempting to assess the High Court’s commercial workload. Reports often use different time periods, and have conflicting figures. Take, for example, the data presented in the 2012 and 2013 High Court Annual Reports.

2012 High Court Annual Report

| Summary of new business and disposals for the year ended 30 November 2012 |
|-----------------|-----------------|-----------------|-----------------|-----------------|
|                  | Jury Trials     | Civil Proceedings | Criminal appeals | Civil Appeals   |
| New Business     |                 |                  |                  |                 |
| 2012             | 212             | 2889             | 1158             | 341             |
| 2011             | 162             | 3005             | 1194             | 353             |
| Disposals        |                 |                  |                  |                 |
| 2012             | 206             | 3072             | 1206             | 328             |
| 2011             | 184             | 3164             | 1213             | 314             |
| Disposals by trial adjudication | |                  |                  |                 |
| 2012             | 113             | 158              |                  |                 |
| 2011             | 123             | 136              |                  |                 |
| Disposals by non-trial adjudication | |                  |                  |                 |
| 2012             |                 | 494              |                  |                 |
| 2011             |                 | 587              |                  |                 |

2013 High Court Annual Report

| Summary of new business and disposals for the year ended 31 December 2013 |
|-----------------|-----------------|-----------------|-----------------|-----------------|
|                  | Criminal Trials | Civil Proceedings | Criminal appeals | Civil Appeals   |
| New Business     |                 |                  |                  |                 |
| 2013             | 215             | 2669             | 1043             | 317             |
| 2012             | 232             | 2827             | 1179             | 338             |
| Disposals        |                 |                  |                  |                 |
| 2013             | 222             | 2598             | 1048             | 317             |
| 2012             | 212             | 3047             | 1213             | 320             |
| Disposals by trial adjudication | |                  |                  |                 |
| 2013             |                 | 365              |                  |                 |
| 2012             |                 | 386              |                  |                 |
| Disposals by non-trial adjudication | |                  |                  |                 |
| 2013             |                 | 789              |                  |                 |
| 2012             |                 | 1020             |                  |                 |

73 For instance, Courts of New Zealand “Annual Statistics for the High Court December 2012” <www.courts.of.nz>
74 Table sourced from Winkelmann “2012 High Court Annual Report”, above n 72, at 4.
75 Table sourced from Winkelmann “2013 High Court Annual Report”, above n 72, at 9.
As will be immediately apparent, the reports are conflicting and impossible to reconcile. Whereas the 2013 report clearly covers the 12 months from 1 January 2013 to 31 December 2013, the 2012 report fails to clarify whether the period covered is the 11 months from January 2012 to November 2012, or the full 12 months from December 2011 to November 2012. Already, therefore, one faces significant difficulties when trying to compare the two reports.

However, of greater concern are the reports’ conflicting statistics. According to the 2013 report, the High Court resolved 386 civil proceedings by trial in 2012, dramatically overstating the 2012 report’s version of events, which recorded only 158 civil cases as being determined by trial to the year ended 30 November. Thus, unless the High Court released 228 judgments in December 2012 (the one month for which there is no data), the two reports are irreconcilable, preventing any meaningful comparison.

Faced with contradictory official reports, the Law Commission examined a small sample of the civil cases that were “disposed of” in the Auckland and Wellington High Court registries between 2008 and 2010.76 Whilst they successfully broke the claims down into 41 categories, such as negligence, contract, and insurance cases, their work provided little insight for three reasons. First, because the categorisation was done by court staff, it “is not necessarily as accurate as if it had been done by legally trained people.”77 Secondly, because the claims were broken down into so many categories, “it is difficult to get a broad sense of the overall classes of case[s]” determined by the High Court.78 Finally, because the sample only considered claims that progressed to trial, it failed to provide any information on the roughly 91–93% of proceedings that settle pre-trial.79

There is, therefore, no publically available information to support or refute practitioners’ claims that a significant amount of commercial litigation is being diverted from the High Court to alternative dispute fora.

2 District Court proceedings

Nor is there any conclusive evidence to suggest that the District Court has lost its commercial jurisdiction. Although this paper focuses on the High Court, the vast

---

77 Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.50].
78 Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.50].
79 Winkelmann “2012 High Court Annual Report”, above n 72 at 6; and Winkelmann “2013 High Court Annual Report”, above n 72, at 11.
majority of New Zealand’s civil disputes, up to a value of $200,000, are resolved by generalist judges in the District Court. Accordingly, if, as practitioners claim, commercial parties have lost confidence in generalist judges’ abilities to grasp the factual and/or legal nuances of their disputes, one would expect to see a decline in the level of District Court commercial litigation.

Prima facie, this is exactly what has happened. As the following graph reveals, the number of defended cases filed, and disposed of at trial by the District Court fell by almost two-thirds between June 2009 and June 2013, suggesting strong litigant dissatisfaction with the generalist court system.

However, this decline in litigation provides little support for practitioners’ claims for two reasons.

First, the District Court has always used generalist judges to resolve civil disputes.
Accordingly, it would be unlikely that litigants suddenly lost confidence in the Court’s judges between 2009 and 2010. Instead, as the Court’s annual reports reveal,

80 District Courts Act 1947, s 29. This jurisdiction is set to increase to $350,000 under cl 256 of the 81 Graph sourced from District Courts of New Zealand Annual Report 2013 (Wellington) at 39.
Importantly, the graph and accompanying figures only relate to those cases which proceeded to trial.
There are no publically available statistics on the number of civil claims filed.
a more likely explanation for the rapid decline was the introduction of new District Court Rules in November 2009,\textsuperscript{82} which strongly encouraged pre-trial settlement.\textsuperscript{83}

Unfortunately, there is no publically available data on the number of civil claims filed, however, the increased focus on pre-trial settlements from November 2009 explains the rapid decline in the number of “defended civil cases”, as plotted on the graph above. Indeed, this explanation is further supported by the stabilisation in civil litigation numbers between 2012 and 2013, after all of the changes ‘washed through’.

Secondly, even if it were possible to ‘strip-out’ the new court rules’ impact, the District Court’s statistics only refer to “civil litigation”, providing no information as to the underlying state of “commercial litigation”.

Consequently, as with the High Court, there is no publically available information to support practitioners’ claims that commercial parties have lost confidence in generalist judges’ ability to resolve their disputes.

\textit{C Has there been an upsurge in ADR’s popularity?}

Nevertheless, if, as many practitioners claim, the High Court is in danger of losing its commercial litigation practice,\textsuperscript{84} then one would expect to see, first, a significant increase in the use of ADR and, secondly, evidence linking this rise in ADR to the High Court’s generalist structure, rather than factors such as time, cost and flexibility. Once again, however, there is a distinct lack of empirical evidence.

Whereas the Ministry of Justice compiles data on the number of claims filed and resolved in New Zealand’s courts, there is no central dispute resolution body to collate or produce any meaningful ADR statistics.\textsuperscript{85} Moreover, because disputes are resolved confidentially, and in many different fora, it becomes almost impossible for researchers even to begin to estimate the numbers of disputes resolved outside the court system.

\textsuperscript{82} District Court Rules 2009, r 1.2.
\textsuperscript{83} Courts of New Zealand “Annual Statistics for the District Courts – December 2011” <www.courtsofnz.govt.nz>
\textsuperscript{84} For example Galbraith, above n 1, at 421 who stated that “in Auckland, the majority of substantial commercial disputes, other than debt collecting, are now determined by alternative dispute fora – arbitrators and mediators”.
\textsuperscript{85} Whilst there are two ADR professional organisations in New Zealand – LEADR (Lawyers Engaged in Alternative Dispute Resolution) and AMINZ (Arbitrators’ and Mediators’ Institute of New Zealand), neither compile statistics on the use of ADR in New Zealand.
Fortunately, there is one very limited exception. In 2004, the Ministry of Justice released a report on the use of ADR in “general civil cases.” Based upon surveys with lawyers, ADR professionals, litigants and judges, the research attempted to answer many of the “unanswered questions”, such as whether ADR’s use was growing, and the reasons for that growth, if any.

In terms of ADR’s overall use, the report’s findings were underwhelming. Perhaps reflecting the nature of a survey, the report simply found that:

With the exception of [litigants], all the stakeholder groups expressed a view that the use of ADR is increasing. Among ADR practitioners, however … there is a view that the increase in ADR take-up, especially mediation, has not been as pronounced or as extensive as predicted in the 1980s and 1990s.

Nevertheless, other aspects of the report are illuminating. Lawyers who primarily worked in the High Court reported that of the 1,923 general civil cases they handled in 2002, 1,193 were filed in the High Court, and 730 were not. In other words, only 61% of claims, eligible to be heard in the High Court, were actually filed. Furthermore, of the 730 unfiled claims, lawyers reported that 494 were settled through ADR during the survey’s time period.

In many respects, this lends significant weight to practitioners’ claims that the High Court is at risk of losing its civil jurisdiction. If the above figures are correct, then the High Court may hear less than 5.5% of all civil claims in New Zealand. Furthermore, with 88.5% of lawyers surveyed reporting that commercial contract disputes were suitable for ADR, the risk is that the proportion of commercial (rather than civil) cases being diverted from courts to ADR is considerably higher.

---

86 K Saville-Smith and R Fraser Alternative Dispute Resolution: General Civil Cases (Ministry of Justice, Wellington, 2004).
87 Saville-Smith and Fraser, above n 86, at 2.
88 Saville-Smith and Fraser, above n 86, at 16.
89 The survey covered the period 1 January 2002 to 31 December 2002.
90 Saville-Smith and Fraser, above n 86, at 40.
91 Saville-Smith and Fraser, above n 86, at 40.
92 This was done primarily through lawyer-lawyer negotiation and mediation. See Saville-Smith and Fraser, above n 86, at 40.
93 If one accepts that the High Court resolves between 7 – 9% of all civil claims filed, as suggested by the High Court annual reports, and only 61% of civil claims are filed in the High Court, then on the basis of these figures, the High Court would determine only 5.49% of all reported civil disputes.
94 Saville-Smith and Fraser, above n 86, at 14.
However, this does not provide sufficient evidence to support practitioners’ claims that litigants are being driven into ADR due to a lack of High Court specialisation for two reasons. First, the survey was conducted in 2003, with the questions relating to 2002. In the intervening decade, lawyer and client perceptions of ADR and the High Court may have changed significantly, leading to the survey’s results becoming outdated by 2014.

Secondly, and more importantly, the survey fails to identify the extent to which the High Court’s generalist structure is fuelling ADR’s use.\textsuperscript{95} ADR offers many advantages over litigation independent of the level of judicial specialisation, such as reduced cost and time relative to court proceedings,\textsuperscript{96} and increased confidentiality\textsuperscript{97} and flexibility.\textsuperscript{98} Thus, while the survey may be useful as a historical benchmark for any future research, it fails to shed much light on the link between a lack of judicial specialisation and ADR’s use.

\textsuperscript{95} The report provided the following table. Saville-Smith and Fraser, above n 86, at 27.

\textbf{Lawyers’ Perceptions of Disputants’ Reasons for ADR Take-Up (multiple responses allowed)}

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Perceived Disputant Reason</th>
<th>Responses</th>
<th>% of Lawyers (n = 196)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Want to reduce costs</td>
<td>183</td>
<td>93.4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Want speedy resolution</td>
<td>159</td>
<td>81.1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Uncertainty of court outcome</td>
<td>142</td>
<td>72.4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Preservation of ongoing relationship</td>
<td>86</td>
<td>43.9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Desire for compromise solution</td>
<td>82</td>
<td>41.8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Desire for more control over process and outcome</td>
<td>80</td>
<td>40.8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Privacy and confidentiality</td>
<td>74</td>
<td>37.8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Directed by contract, statute or existing agreement</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>31.1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Desire for creative solution</td>
<td>48</td>
<td>24.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Concerns about court procedures</td>
<td>39</td>
<td>19.9</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Importantly, one cannot use the uncertainty of court outcome as a proxy for judicial specialisation given the number of other explanations for such a response.

\textsuperscript{96} See, for example, Saville-Smith and Fraser, above n 86, at 26 – 29; Susan Blake, Julie Browne and Stuart Sime A Practical Approach to Alternative Dispute Resolution (2nd ed, Oxford University Press, Oxford, 2012) at [14.14]; and Roger Pitchforth “Arbitration” in Peter Spiller (ed) Dispute Resolution in New Zealand (2nd ed, Oxford University Press, Sydney, 2007) at 130.

\textsuperscript{97} For example, David L Kreider, head of Vodafone New Zealand’s legal team who stated that: “Above all else, a ‘household name’ business and consumer services company like Vodafone, when faced with a dispute, will wish to protect its brand and reputation. In any dispute situation, this is my overarching objective” (emphasis added). He continued, “[f]or this reason, the privacy, and where available, the confidentiality, offered by arbitration is a very attractive feature to in-house counsels.” David L Kreider “A Corporate General Counsel’s Perspective on Arbitration” (speech to the Arbitrators’ and Mediators’ Institute of New Zealand Conference, Auckland, 4 – 6 August 2011). See also Virginia Goldblatt “Confidentiality in Mediation” [2000] NZ L Rev 392 at 392.

\textsuperscript{98} Whereas litigation is governed by strict rules of procedure set out in the District Court Rules 2009 and the High Court Rules, ADR is far more flexible. For example, in both arbitration and mediation, parties have free reign over the location, dates, timetabling and choice of New Zealand or foreign law.
IV Where to from here?

How, then, can one assess whether specialist High Court commercial panels are required or desirable?

A Seek and they shall come

One suggestion, recently adopted by both the Law Commission and the government, has been to take a ‘seek and they shall come’ approach.\(^{99}\) The idea “is that expertise is like a magnet. The more there is of it, the more people will be drawn to it.”\(^{100}\) By introducing judicial specialisation, commercial parties who were previously unwilling to use the court system will come out of the woodwork, leading to increased use of the High Court, and an increased ability to shape New Zealand’s commercial law.\(^{101}\)

The problem is that reform commenced on this basis threatens to affect the provision of justice in New Zealand profoundly, with little to no guarantee of success. Even if this approach could be justified in other areas, changes that fundamentally affect the nature of the judiciary should not be introduced based solely on a perception voiced by senior members of the legal profession.

B A more principled approach

Instead, fundamental reform of the judiciary should only occur if empirical evidence or comprehensive survey results clearly demonstrate a link between commercial disputes, ADR, and a lack of High Court specialisation.\(^{102}\) In particular, it is suggested that judicial specialisation will only be justified if it can be shown that:

1. relative to historical trends and comparable jurisdictions, the High Court has ‘lost’ a significant proportion of its commercial jurisdiction (both in terms of numbers of cases filed, and types of cases heard and decided);
2. the ‘lost’ commercial cases are being resolved through ADR or in offshore fora; and
3. the primary reason for litigants’ movement away from the formal civil justice system is a lack of judicial specialisation.

\(^{99}\) Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.60]; and (5 December 2013) 695 NZPD 15305 per Raymond Huo MP. See also Allsop, above n 47, at 15.

\(^{100}\) Grant, above n 53.

\(^{101}\) See, for instance, Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.60] (emphasis added).

\(^{102}\) Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.41].
The reasons for adopting these criteria, and the means by which research into these may be carried out, are summarised below.

1  Loss of the High Court’s commercial jurisdiction

Notwithstanding practitioners’ claims that specialist judges deliver higher quality judgments in a shorter time and at a lower cost than generalist judges, there can be no mandate to introduce judicial specialisation until research reveals that the High Court has lost a significant portion of its commercial jurisdiction.

The core difference between a loss of litigation due to a lack of specialisation, and the speed, quality and cost of judgments in a generalist system, is that the latter can be fixed through moderate changes within the current system, whereas the former cannot. Issues of speed and cost can be reduced through more intensive case management procedures, whilst inadequate judicial reasoning is remedied through the exercise of parties’ rights of appeal. In contrast, a loss of litigation due to a lack of judicial specialisation cannot be remedied by tinkering with the current system. Proceedings are either filed in the High Court, or not.

Accordingly, any introduction of judicial specialisation must be predicated on a finding that the High Court lacks exposure to a significant portion of New Zealand’s commercial jurisdiction. This may be established through, inter alia, a combination of historical research and comparisons with similar common law jurisdictions.

Specifically, the Law Commission (or other research agency) should attempt to map out (a) the number of civil cases filed; (b) the number of defended trials; and (c) the percentage of defended trials per filing across the High Court and other specialist New Zealand courts over the last 30 – 40 years. This data can then be used in several ways.

---

103 For example, Molloy, above n 17, at 20; Katz, above n 1, at 39. See also Glazebrook, above n 7, at 537; and Letter from Michael Black (Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Australia) to Bruce Robertson (President of the Law Commission) regarding judicial specialisation (August 2003), cited in Law Commission Delivering Justice for All: A Vision for New Zealand Courts and Tribunals (NZLC R85, 2004) [Law Commission Delivering Justice for All] at 266.

104 See generally, Helen Winkelmann and others The New High Court Case Management Regime (New Zealand Law Society, Wellington, 2013). For a contrary view, see Jim Farmer “Civil Litigation in Crisis” in New Zealand Bar Association Civil Litigation in Crisis – What Crisis (February 2008).

105 Such as the Employment, Environment and Family Courts.
First, reflecting population growth, one would expect to see a significant increase in both the numbers of filings and defended High Court trials over the time period. If this is not the case, then this indicates that litigants are increasingly looking towards ADR to resolve their disputes, suggesting a loss of High Court litigation.

Secondly, the Law Commission should compare the percentage of defended hearings per filings across the High Court and specialist New Zealand courts to determine whether a disproportionate proportion of High Court cases are settled pre-trial relative to other courts. Although far from conclusive, data showing higher settlement rates in the High Court, relative to specialist courts, indicates that litigants are reluctant to allow their disputes to be resolved by generalist judges. Where data is available, these settlement rates could be compared to the settlement rates in other common law jurisdictions.

Thirdly, by taking a geographically representative sample of cases filed in the High Court registries over the past 40 years, historical data trend analysis can reveal changes in the nature of the High Court’s work over time. This is particularly useful in determining whether the Court is ‘losing’ some of its commercial jurisdiction. For example, if contract disputes formed 25% of all civil filings in 1970, but only 5% in 2014, then this would strongly suggest that parties engaged in contract disputes are bypassing the High Court in favour of other dispute resolution fora. If possible, this data should then be compared to data in other common law jurisdictions to determine whether these trends are specific to New Zealand, or have been experienced throughout the rest of the world.

---

106 For an example of historical data trend analysis, see Marc Galanter “The Vanishing Trial: An Examination of Trials and Related Matters in Federal and State Courts” (2004) 1 Journal of Empirical Legal Studies 459.

107 When comparing the High Court’s settlement rates with other specialist courts, the Law Commission (or other research body) will have to be mindful of statutory regimes that require a dispute to be litigated. Where this is the case, settlement rates are likely to be artificially low. Accordingly, an allowance may need to be made when conducting this exercise.

108 A geographically representative sample is required because the majority of commercial disputes occur in Auckland. For example, in 2013, 74% of all civil proceedings were filed in the area covered by the Auckland circuit; 81% in 2012; and 67% in 2011. See Winkelmann “2011 High Court Annual Report”, above n 72; Winkelmann “2012 High Court Annual Report”, above n 72; and Winkelmann “2013 High Court Annual Report”, above n 72.

109 Specialisation has been an issue since at least 1978 (see the Report of the Royal Commission on the Courts, above n 30, at 93 – 96). Accordingly, research should attempt to cover this period so that the effects of specialisation on the High Court’s workload can be isolated and examined.
The ‘lost’ cases are being resolved offshore or in ADR

Even if historical or comparative research reveals that the number of commercial cases filed and determined in the High Court has declined, or failed to rise in line with population growth, this is only part of the picture. The next step is to show that the “missing” cases are being resolved either offshore, or through ADR.

Unfortunately, because there is no historical data on ADR’s use in commercial disputes this will have to be estimated through surveys designed to reveal the current position. The Law Commission should survey a geographically representative sample of lawyers, accredited ADR professionals and, if possible, commercial parties to determine (a) the number of disputes they are involved in; (b) the legal issues involved in the dispute; (c) whether those disputes were filed in the High Court; and (d) how those disputes were resolved.

The purpose of this research is to determine both the size of the ADR market, and the nature of cases resolved through ADR. This information can then be compared to the High Court data in a further attempt to determine whether the cases resolved in the High Court are representative of New Zealand’s commercial disputes.

Link between ADR and judicial specialisation

Finally, the Law Commission (or other research body) must determine the extent of the connection between the generalist High Court and litigants’ choice to pursue ADR. This is the most important piece of the puzzle. Without a direct link, no amount of evidence showing a loss of High Court commercial litigation can provide any justification for introducing judicial specialisation.

This could be done by surveying a representative sample of lawyers and clients, and asking them to rate the importance of factors such as time, cost, flexibility, 110 The two bodies who provide some form of accreditation in New Zealand are LEADR (Lawyers Engaged in Alternative Dispute Resolution) and AMINZ (Arbitrators’ and Mediators’ Institute of New Zealand).

---

111 It will also be necessary to determine the size of the dispute to ensure that it is within the High Court’s jurisdiction rather than the District Courts.

112 This statement assumes that a failure to identify any link between the lack of judicial specialisation and the parties’ decision to use ADR implies that parties chose to pursue ADR for reasons such as cost, time, confidentiality and flexibility.

113 Lawyers’ responses will be of particular importance following the implementation of r 14.4 of the Lawyers and Conveyancers Act (Lawyers: Conduct and Client Care) Rules 2008 which obliges lawyers to “… keep the client advised of alternatives to litigation that are reasonably available (unless the confidentiality and the lack of judicial specialisation, on their decision to pursue ADR rather than litigation.

Whilst this survey questionnaire may take many forms, it should contain several questions addressing the High Court’s lack of specialisation for two reasons. First, asking a question such as “to what extent did the High Court’s lack of specialist judges influence your decision to use ADR?” has the potential to bias the results significantly. In particular, respondents may have given little thought to the High Court’s generalist structure at the time they chose to use ADR, but when presented with such a question may falsely attribute part of their decision to this factor.\footnote{See generally Floyd J and Fowler Jr Survey Research Methods (4th ed, SAGE Publications, Thousand Oaks (CA), 2009) at 14 – 16.}

Secondly, splitting the question into multiple parts will offer greater insight than simply asking one question.\footnote{Floyd and Fowler, above n 114, at 111 argue that for surveys seeking to determine a respondent’s views on issues, it is best to “[a]sk multiple questions, with different question forms [because] … the answers are potentially influenced both by the subjective state to be measured and by specific features of the respondent or of the questions. Some respondents avoid extreme categories; some tend to agree more than disagree. Multiple questions help even out response idiosyncrasies and improve the validity of the measurement process”.} Thus, questions may, inter alia, try work out whether the allocation of a particular judge influenced the parties’ decision to avoid litigation, or whether the parties believed that a generalist judge would struggle to understand the relevant facts. By asking multiple questions, it becomes possible to pinpoint litigants’ fears or concerns, enabling researchers to determine the extent of the link between the generalist bench and ‘ADR’s rise’.\footnote{Obviously these are just suggestions. If the Law Commission was to carry out further research, specialist market advice on framing the relevant questions will be needed.}

4 Summary

Unless solid evidence conclusively links the High Court’s lack of specialisation to a loss of commercial litigation, fundamental reform of the judiciary cannot be justified. By following the steps outlined above, it is suggested that the Law Commission would be capable of determining this issue, providing a sound foundation for the introduction of High Court specialisation if such a need is identified.
V Specialisation Overseas

Calls for increased judicial specialisation are not limited to New Zealand, with countries around the world facing demands from practitioners and others to provide specialist commercial courts or judges.\textsuperscript{117} By analysing the court systems in England, Australia, Singapore and the Cayman Islands, conclusions can be drawn, and lessons learnt, if New Zealand chooses to go down the judicial specialisation path.

A England\textsuperscript{118}

Established in 1895 as part of a judicial initiative to halt the increasing use of arbitration by London’s merchants,\textsuperscript{119} the English Commercial Court is perhaps the most well-known, and successful, specialist court in the common law world.\textsuperscript{120} Located in a purpose-built building with its own support staff, the Court operates under the auspices of the Queen’s Bench Division of the England and Wales High Court,\textsuperscript{121} where it has jurisdiction over “any claim arising out of the transactions of trade and commerce”.\textsuperscript{122}

Parties from around the world, who often have no connection to the United Kingdom, are increasingly entering into contracts to resolve their disputes in the Commercial Court,\textsuperscript{123} providing a significant boost to England’s jurisprudence, economy and legal

\textsuperscript{117} For examples of other jurisdictions that have faced pressure to increase judicial specialisation, see the Chief Justice’s Working Party on Civil Justice Reform \textit{Civil Justice Reform} (2004) Hong Kong Judiciary \texttt{<http://www.judiciary.gov.hk>; and the Scottish Civil Courts Review \textit{Report of the Scottish Civil Courts Review} (September 2009).}

\textsuperscript{118} The author acknowledges that England and Wales share the same legal system. Thus, all references to England should be read as meaning England and Wales.

\textsuperscript{119} See, for example, the comments of one anonymous High Court judge who stated “The bulk of the disputes of the commercial world seldom, in these modern days, finds its way into the Courts. Merchants are shy of litigation. … They prefer even the hazardous and mysterious chances of arbitration …” Published in \textit{The Times} on 10 August 1892. Quoted from Anthony Colman, Victor Lyon and Philippa Hopkins \textit{The Practice and Procedure of the Commercial Court} (6th ed, Informa Law, London, 2008) at 4. It was not until the passage of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 (UK) that the Court achieved statutory recognition.

\textsuperscript{120} See, for example, Richardson, above n 1, at 132. See also Galbraith, above n 1, at 421; and Southwell, above n 11, at 275.

\textsuperscript{121} Senior Courts Act 1981 (UK), s 6.

\textsuperscript{122} Civil Procedure Rules (UK), r 58.2(2).

\textsuperscript{123} Richard Aikens “With a View to Despatch” in Mads Andenas and Duncan Fairgrieve (ed) \textit{Tom Bingham and the Transformation of the Law; A Liber Amicorum} (Oxford University Press, London, 2009) at 587 noted in 2009: “The Commercial Court statistics have consistently shown for about ten years that in 80% of its cases, at least one of the parties is a non-UK entity. In 50% of its cases all the parties are non-UK entities”. This appears to have grown over time, with a 2013 study showing that sector. Legal services now account for 1.8% of the United Kingdom’s gross domestic product, with exports from the provision of legal services to foreigners tripling over a ten year period to £3.2 billion in 2009. Building directly off the Commercial Court’s reputation, London has also become the world’s most popular seat of arbitration, providing significant income to the English legal profession.

A large part of this success has been attributed to the Court’s judges. Appointed on the basis of their pre-bench commercial experience by the Lord Chief Justice, after consulting with the Lord Chancellor, all commercial court judges are judges of the High Court. This is important, because, as puisne judges, they are still required to preside over criminal cases. Thus, in 2004, of the 14 judges appointed to sit in the Court, only 8 to 9 sat in the Commercial Court full-time due to other commitments.

If England, a country with almost 15 times the population of New Zealand cannot sustain a fully specialist commercial court, then this strongly suggests that High Court specialisation in New Zealand would only require judges in a part-time capacity.

However, as the Commercial Court’s history reveals, specialist judges only form part of the picture. In 1960, the Court risked oblivion. Filings had plummeted to just 27 in 1958, and judges such as Devlin J openly questioned whether “the time may come when it will have to be considered whether there is any longer any value in the Commercial Court”. Since then, the Court has embarked on a series of reforms to ensure its continued viability, providing several lessons for New Zealand if it chooses to pursue judicial specialisation.

“over 75% of litigants using the Commercial Court are foreign, with the highest regional representation from Europe and Eurasia” Portland Communications “The World’s Legal Capital? Who Uses the Commercial Court” <www.portland-communications.com>.

125 See generally Aikens, above n 123, at 576 – 577.

126 See, for example, the Report of the Singapore International Commercial Court Committee (November 2013) <www.mlaw.gov.sg> at 11 which states “… The success of the UK legal sector is founded on the global dominance of English law for contracts, the prestige and standing of its judicial system, in particular the Commercial Court, and the acknowledged quality of its commercial judges and barristers” (emphasis added).

127 Senior Courts Act 1981, s 6(2).

129 Indeed, the Law Commission appears to have accepted this. See Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.69].

130 Aikens, above n 123, at 571; and Colman, Lyon and Hopkins, above n 119, at 8.

131 Colman, Lyon and Hopkins, above n 119, at 8.

132 Peter Cassidy Seed Co Ltd v Osuutukkukauppa IL [1957] 1 WLR 273 at 280.
At the heart of this reform has been a high level of practitioner and client involvement in the Court’s development and administration through the Commercial Court Users Committee. Established in 1960, and formalised in 1977, the Committee is chaired by the judge in charge of the Commercial Court, and contains representatives from the bar, solicitors, arbitrators, banks, government agencies, and a variety of domestic and foreign commercial litigants. It meets at least four times a year, and is heavily involved in the Court’s administration and procedure, helping to ensure that the Court remains competitive, and retains a steady stream of litigation.

For example, a direct product of the Committee’s reports has been the adoption of several procedures designed to reduce trial lengths, and encourage efficiency. Thus, statements of claim are limited to 25 pages, and witnesses are required to provide written statements to be used in place of an oral examination in chief. Pre-trial settlement is also encouraged through the parties’ ability to request, subject to the judge in charge of the Commercial Court’s approval, “a without-prejudice, non-binding early neutral evaluation (ENE) of a dispute or of particular issues” by a commercial court judge.

Interestingly, even with the ability to seek an ENE, only 70% of Commercial Court cases settle before trial, compared with 91% in New Zealand’s High Court – possibly reflecting a higher degree of litigant confidence in the specialist Commercial Court judges.

Finally, recent statutory reforms have ensured that the Commercial Court is not faced with an impossibly high workload. Since the 1990s, straightforward commercial disputes of a lower value have been diverted to Mercantile Courts based in London.

---

133 Colman, Lyon and Hopkins, above n 119, at 27.
134 Colman, Lyon and Hopkins, above n 119, at 27 – 32.
135 Her Majesty’s Courts & Tribunals Service The Admiralty and Commercial Courts Guide (9th ed, March 2013) at C1.1. This limit will only be extended in exceptional cases “where a party shows good reasons for doing so.”
136 The Admiralty and Commercial Courts Guide, above n 136, at C1.1. These statements are limited to 30 pages in length unless the court directs otherwise.
138 The Admiralty and Commercial Courts Guide, above n 136, at G.2. If the parties choose to continue their litigation, the judge who performed the ENE will take no further part in the case, “unless the parties agree otherwise” – see The Admiralty and Commercial Courts Guide, above n 136, at G.2.5
139 Aikens, above n 123, at 578.
140 There is no upper limit on the Mercantile Court’s jurisdiction, but it is safe to assume that disputes of less than US$500,000 will end up in the Mercantile Court. See Colman, Lyon and Hopkins, above n 119, at 47.
and other major cities. Like the Commercial Court, these Courts remain part of the Queen’s Bench Division of the High Court, and are staffed with specialist commercial judges. This has ensured that litigants throughout England and Wales have access to specialist judges, whilst allowing the Commercial Court to concentrate on higher value and more complicated commercial claims.

In summary, whilst the provision of specialist judges helped to establish the Court in the early 20th century, it has achieved its current position as the “curia franca of international commerce” through its continuous efforts to adapt its structure and procedures to meet the business community’s, and its lawyer’s, needs.

B Australia

As New Zealand’s closest neighbour, our second largest trading partner, and a fellow common law jurisdiction, Australia, and its level of specialisation, is of particular relevance to New Zealand. Accordingly, this paper briefly considers the specialist structures within the Federal Court of Australia (FCA), and the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

1 Federal Court of Australia

Established in 1976, the FCA provides an interesting comparison due to its use of specialist panels and individual docket system.

Unlike the other courts surveyed, the level of judicial specialisation differs across the FCA’s registries. In some parts of Australia, for example, South Australia and the Australian Capital Territory, judges are generalists, and there is no specialisation. In contrast, the FCA’s larger registries have established specialist panels in areas such as intellectual property, tax, competition, corporations, and workplace relations.

In this regard, the FCA can be seen as a quasi-specialist court. Depending upon the

---

141 Mercantile Courts are based in the district registries of the High Court in Birmingham, Bristol, Cardiff, Chester, Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester, Mold and Newcastle upon Tyne and London. Civil Procedure Rules 1998 (UK) Practice Direction 59 – Mercantile Courts at 1.2.

142 Amin Rasheed Shipping Company Corp v Kuwait Insurance Co [1983] 1 WLR 228 (CA) at 240 per Sir John Donaldson MR.

144 Specialist panels exist in the New South Wales, Victoria and Queensland registries. For a full list see Federal Court of Australia “Panels for the Docket System” (May 2014) <www.fedcourt.gov.au>.

145 Federal Court of Australia, above n 144.
nature of the dispute and the registry in which it is filed, cases may be allocated to either a specialist or generalist judge.

Of greater importance, however, is the means by which panel judges are appointed. Whilst the FCA Chief Justice nominally controls the appointments process, by convention, judges are assigned to panels for a three-year term, upon their request. This is important for two reasons. First, by providing judges with a guaranteed three-year tenure, panel judges face less pressure to appease the Chief Justice in order to remain on the panel. As will be explained in the context of the New Zealand government’s proposed reforms, this helps to safeguard individual judicial independence. Secondly, the ability of FCA judges to request appointment provides a strong bulwark against judicial manipulation by removing the Chief Justice’s ability to ‘stack’ panels with judges that conform to his or her views.

Although this voluntary appointments process may lead to concerns about non-specialist judges ending up on specialist panels, this is managed by requiring judges to “accept a responsibility to become familiar with the area … [and] take an active part in regular judicial education programmes”. Not only are judges likely to take their judicial obligations seriously, but the requirement to conduct lectures is likely to deter non-specialist judges from requesting appointment to areas where they will be unable to perform their duties adequately.

146 Law Commission Delivering Justice for All, above n 103, at 265.
148 This was reflected in some of the concerns raised by practitioners in Caroline Sage, Ted Wright and Carolyn Morris Case Management Reform: A Study of the Federal Court’s Individual Docket System (Law and Justice Foundation of New South Wales, 2002) at 63.
149 See Law Commission Delivering Justice for All, above n 103, at 265; and Black, above n 192, at 1042.
150 In 2003, “the Chief Justice describe[d] the advantages of the panel system as follows:

a) it widens the specialist base of the court: the allocation of specialist cases within a panel substantially increases the chance of individual judges hearing a reasonable number of such cases, where if they were distributed randomly among the Melbourne and Sydney judges (of whom there are almost 30) the level of experience in specialist areas would drop

b) the system promotes expertise

c) it gives judges the opportunity to do work they like, and others the opportunity to avoid work they do not like.

Letter from Michael Black (Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Australia) to Bruce Robertson (President of the Law Commission) regarding judicial specialisation (August 2003), cited in Law Commission Delivering Justice for All, above n 103 at 265.
The FCA’s second “distinctive” feature is its use of an individual docket system.151 Introduced in 1997, cases are assigned, upon filing, by the registrar to a judge using a strictly rotational system, who is then given responsibility to manage the case from its commencement to disposal at trial.152 The aim of the system is to “promote more active and effective judicial case management … streamline processing, encourage early settlement and, overall, to dispose of cases more efficiently.”153 Importantly, this system continues to apply to panel cases. Thus, where cases fall within the jurisdiction of a particular panel, the registrar simply assigns cases to panel judges on the same strictly rotational basis.154

Although concerns have been raised about whether the use of a strictly rotational system has resulted in an equitable distribution of work,155 and whether it may be possible to ‘game’ the system by filing cases in a way which gets particular judges assigned,156 the overall view of the system is incredibly positive.157

2 New South Wales

One of the New South Wales Supreme Court’s most remarkable features is its longstanding history of commercial specialisation. In 1903, following the English Commercial Court’s lead, Bill Wise, New South Wales’ Attorney-General introduced the Commercial Causes Act. Designed to “provide a more expeditious method for the trial of commercial causes”,158 the Act established a commercial list to deal with commercial disputes, and empowered list judges to dispense with procedural rules “in order to ensure the speedy determination of those issues.”159

---

151 Sage, Wright and Morris, above n 148, at 169. See also Steven Rares “The Significance of the Commercial Jurisdiction of the Federal Court of Australia” (2008) 22 CLQ 25 at [37].
152 Sage, Wright and Morris, above n 148, from 57; Law Commission Delivering Justice for All, above n 103, at 265; and Rares, above n 151, at [37].
153 Sage, Wright and Morris, above n 148, at 169. See also Rares, above n 151, at [37].
154 Sage, Wright and Morris, above n 148, from 57, Law Commission Delivering Justice for All, above n 103, at 265; and Rares, above n 151, at [37].
155 Sage, Wright and Morris, above n 148, at 60.
156 Sage, Wright and Morris, above n 148, at 59.
157 Sage, Wright and Morris, above n 148, at 55 concluded that “the aims and goals of the Individual Docket System were being achieved”. They continued, “judges said that the greatest benefit … was increased control over their workload and time [whilst] practitioners generally considered that the new system had a positive impact on how they approached litigation”.
158 Commercial Causes Act 1903 (NSW) long title.
159 See J J Spigelman, Chief Justice of New South Wales, “Commercial Causes Centenary” (speech to the dinner held to celebrate 100 years since the commencement of the Commercial Causes Act 1903, Sydney, 6 November 2003) at 3.
Although “[t]he organisational structure for commercial litigation has [developed] from single judges administering an informal list, to a formal commercial list to a separate Commercial Division”, commercial specialisation is now provided through the commercial list in the Equity Division of the Supreme Court.

Like the English Commercial Court, the scope of New South Wales’ commercial list is extremely broad. Under the Uniform Civil Procedure Rules, the commercial list has jurisdiction over all “proceedings arising out of commercial transactions” and “proceedings in which there is an issue that has importance in trade or commerce”.

However, reflecting the list’s structure, New South Wales judges are, at best, quasi-specialist. Not only are judges appointed to multiple lists, but “the first claim on [their time] is the criminal business of the court”. Given that New South Wales has a population of more than 7 million, this indicates that specialisation within the New Zealand High Court would have to be done on a similar basis.

One concern with the New South Wales list system is the means by which judges are appointed and dismissed. The Chief Justice of New South Wales has an untrammelled power to appoint judges (of either division) to a list, but more importantly, “may at any time … revoke a Judge’s designation as a List Judge.” As will be discussed later, in the context of the proposed reforms to New Zealand’s High Court, the risk, from placing the power of appointment and dismissal in the hands of one person, is that the Chief Justice may “panel pack” the list, in an attempt to manipulate the result of a case, or development of the law. In this regard, it potentially poses a substantial threat to the principle of individual judicial independence.

Nevertheless, the commercial list appears to be reasonably successful. Whilst the number of filings dropped between 2008 and 2012, this is consistent with a trend

---

160 See Spigelman, above n 159, at 4.
161 Uniform Civil Procedure Rules 2005 (NSW), r 45.1. See also the Supreme Court Act 1970 (NSW), s 38.
162 Uniform Civil Procedure Rules 2005 (NSW), r 45.6(1).
164 Supreme Court Act 1970 (NSW), s 28(1).
165 Supreme Court Act 1970 (NSW), s 28(5).
observed in other courts,\textsuperscript{169} as the world moves from recession to recovery. Instead, a more representative indication of the list’s success is the high number of cases awaiting trial,\textsuperscript{170} indicating a strong demand for specialist dispute settlement. A further reason for this success may be the existence of the commercial list users committee which, like the English Commercial Court Users Committee, ensures a steady stream of dialogue between the court and practitioners.

\textbf{C Singapore}

As a common law jurisdiction with a population of 5.5 million,\textsuperscript{171} Singapore provides a particularly interesting comparison from a New Zealand perspective.

With the limited exception of its Admiralty and Intellectual Property Courts, Singapore, like New Zealand, is a generalist jurisdiction.\textsuperscript{172} At present, all commercial disputes with a value exceeding S$250,000 fall within the jurisdiction of the Singapore High Court, where they are resolved by generalist judges.\textsuperscript{173} However, this is about to change significantly, with the proposed establishment of the Singapore International Commercial Court (SICC).\textsuperscript{174}

Although the final details are yet to be announced, the government hopes to create “the premium forum for court-based commercial dispute resolution both within and beyond Asia”,\textsuperscript{175} by establishing the SICC as a division of the High Court. Doing so will ensure maximum worldwide enforceability of its judgments,\textsuperscript{176} and enable it to exercise coercive powers when determining conflict of laws issues.\textsuperscript{177}

\textsuperscript{169} See, for example, Courts of New Zealand “Annual Statistics for the High Court December 2013” <www.courtsfern.nz.govt.nz>.
\textsuperscript{170} See Supreme Court of New South Wales, above n 168, at 57. Between 2008 and 2012, the number of cases awaiting trial in the commercial list has remained above 280 – a large number when one considers that the court only disposed of 178 cases in 2012.
\textsuperscript{172} Supreme Court of Singapore “Our Courts” (3 July 2014) <app.supremecourt.gov.sg>.
\textsuperscript{173} State Courts Act (Singapore, cap 321, 2007 rev ed), s 2(b).
\textsuperscript{174} See, for example, Report of the Singapore International Commercial Court Committee (November 2013) <www.ml.gov.sg>; and K Shanmugam, Singapore Minister for Law, “Addendum to the President’s Address to Parliament” (speech to the Parliament of Singapore, Singapore, 23 May 2014) at [8]. The Ministry of Law recently sought consultation on the proposed legislation to enact the SICC, see Ministry of Law “Draft Supreme Court of Judicature (Amendment) Bill 2014” (8 April 2014) <www.ml.gov.sg>.
\textsuperscript{175} Report of the Singapore International Commercial Court Committee, above n 174, at 11.
\textsuperscript{177} Report of the Singapore International Commercial Court Committee, above n 174, at 12.
More importantly, the Committee that proposed the SICC’s establishment, recommended several additional features to bolster the Court’s attractiveness to foreign litigants, all of which appear to have been accepted by the government. First, like the English Commercial Court, parties will not need to show any link to Singapore before falling within the SICC’s jurisdiction. Instead, they simply need to establish that their dispute involves an issue of commercial law, as defined by the UNICTRAL Model Law, and a consensual agreement to resolve their case at the SICC, either before or after the dispute arose.

Secondly, there is no obligation to litigate disputes under Singapore law. Cases can be determined under the parties’ choice of law and, unlike other courts, there will be no requirement to plead, and prove, foreign law as fact. Instead, SICC judges will simply “take judicial notice of foreign law with the assistance of oral and written legal submissions, supported by relevant authorities.” Additionally, where disputes have no substantial connection to Singapore, parties may be represented by foreign counsel, so long as they are registered with the SICC.

---

179 Report of the Singapore International Commercial Court Committee, above n 174, at 14. The SICC Committee proposed using the definition of “commercial” under art 1(1) of the UNCITRAL Model Law on International Commercial Arbitration GA Res 61/33, A/61/17 (1985) which states “The term “commercial” should be given a wide interpretation so as to cover matters arising from all relationships of a commercial nature, whether contractual or not. Relationships of a commercial nature include, but are not limited to, the following transactions: any trade transaction for the supply or exchange of goods or services; distribution agreement; commercial representation or agency; factoring; leasing; construction of works; consulting; engineering; licensing; investment; financing; banking; insurance; exploitation agreement or concession; joint venture and other forms of industrial or business cooperation; carriage of goods or passengers by air, sea, rail or road.”
180 Report of the Singapore International Commercial Court Committee, above n 174, at 13 – 14. This was summarised at 5 where they stated “[the] SICC will deal with three categories of cases, where (i) parties have consented to using the SICC post-dispute; (ii) disputants are parties to a contract giving the SICC jurisdiction over any disputes arising out of that contract; and (iii) cases within the Singapore High Court’s jurisdiction which are transferred to the SICC by the Chief Justice.”
183 “What constitutes the absence of substantial connection will be further refined in consultation with stakeholders, but will include cases in which either (i) Singapore law is not the governing law; or (ii) the choice of Singapore law is the sole connection to Singapore” Report of the Singapore International Commercial Court Committee, above n 174, at 19.
184 Report of the Singapore International Commercial Court Committee, above n 174, at 19. This is not designed to be an onerous task, with foreign lawyers simply required to provide a business address and undertake to abide by a set of ethical rules.
Thirdly, whilst proceedings will ordinarily “take place in open court”, special rules will apply where the dispute is being resolved under foreign law, or where the “choice of Singapore law is the sole connection to Singapore”. In such cases, where all parties agree that the dispute shall be confidential, hearings will be conducted in camera, and judgments will be redacted. If parties fail to agree on the confidentiality of proceedings, SICC judges retain the discretion to make any orders according to any private interest in confidentiality, and the public interest in open and transparent justice.

However, it is the Court’s use of international judges and a specialist Court of Appeal that sets it apart from its competitors. Although the SICC will be a division of the High Court, cases will be assigned by the Chief Justice to specialist commercial judges appointed to the SICC panel. Significantly, SICC judges are not required to be Singaporean. Where the Chief Justice desires, international judges can be appointed to the SICC panel “for a fixed period, and then assigned cases on an ad hoc basis.” Unlike their Singaporean counterparts, international judges will not have security of tenure, and will be paid according to “an agreed rate based on the number of days required for the specific case.” Nonetheless, their availability is likely to be a key drawcard for foreign commercial litigants.

The Court’s second defining feature is the right of appeal to a specialist Court of Appeal made up of three judges from the SICC panel. This continuation of specialisation to the Court of Appeal (the highest court in the Singaporean hierarchy) represents a selling point unmatched by the English Commercial Court or the Commercial Division of the New York Supreme Court.

---

193 Unlike its New Zealand counterpart, the Singapore Court of Appeal sits at the top of the judicial hierarchy.
194 See The Chief Judge’s Task Force on Commercial Litigation in the 21st Century Report and Recommendations to the Chief Judge of the State of New York (June 2012) <www.nycourts.gov> at 21 which stated that: “The Appellate Divisions and Court of Appeals are vital to the development of commercial law in New York State. The liberal availability of interlocutory appeals from Commercial Division rulings is rare among competitor courts and is generally considered by practitioners to be beneficial. But even as a number of former Commercial Division Justices have been added to the Appellate Divisions in recent years, the increasingly complex nature of some commercial litigation appeals may warrant reforms to the appellate process.”
Whilst the appointment of international judges on an ad hoc basis raises legitimate questions around a lack of judicial independence,\textsuperscript{194} this is less worrying than it would be in most municipal courts because the SICC does not have a monopoly over its ‘clients’. Where foreign litigants believe, or at least perceive, that their case will not be resolved fairly, then they are highly unlikely to agree to the SICC’s jurisdiction. In other words, market forces are likely to ensure an independent and impartial judiciary. Moreover, because the international judges are likely to be well known and respected, this should help to assuage any further concerns of partiality and corruption.

Remarkably, even though many of the procedural details are yet to be announced, the SICC appears highly likely to succeed. In a briefing to its clients, one of the world’s leading law firms, Clifford Chance, described “the proposed SICC [a]s a masterstroke. The idea is at once bold, visionary and entrepreneurial.”\textsuperscript{195} It continued:\textsuperscript{196}

> The rationale behind the proposal is compelling … Singapore, with its well-developed legal system, world class infrastructure and "trusted hub status", is ideally positioned to become Asia's premier dispute resolution hub to handle the expected growth in complex, high value, multi-jurisdictional commercial and investment disputes.

Indeed, to the extent that the SICC develops a strong reputation, New Zealand businesses may choose to resolve their disputes in Singapore, posing an additional threat to the development of New Zealand’s commercial law.

\textbf{D Cayman Islands}

With a population of less than 55,000,\textsuperscript{197} and a GDP of just US$3.1 billion,\textsuperscript{198} the Cayman Islands is, perhaps, an unlikely candidate for judicial specialisation. Nonetheless, since its inception on 2 November 2009, the Financial Services Division

\begin{flushleft}
\textsuperscript{195} Clifford Chance “Briefing Note: The Singapore International Commercial Court – A Masterstroke” (17 December 2013) <www.cliffordchance.com> at 1.
\textsuperscript{196} Clifford Chance, above n 195, at 2.
\textsuperscript{197} Central Intelligence Agency “The World Factbook – Cayman Islands” (20 June 2014) <www.cia.gov>.
\textsuperscript{198} Gabriel Torres and others “Credit Analysis of the Government of the Cayman Islands” (5 December 2013) Moody’s Investors Service <www.moodys.com> at 11.
\end{flushleft}
(FSD) of the Grand Court (equivalent to New Zealand’s High Court) has become increasingly important, dealing with hundreds of cases every year.\textsuperscript{199}

Although the FSD has a more limited focus than the SICC and the English Commercial Court, the definition of “financial services proceedings” is relatively broad, and includes any proceedings against a mutual fund, its directors, trustees, and managers; insurance claims; trust and partnership claims; professional negligence actions; and arbitral appeals.\textsuperscript{200} In this regard, it cannot properly be considered a commercial court. Nevertheless, given the Cayman Islands’ status as a “thriving offshore financial centre”,\textsuperscript{201} the FSD has essentially become the Islands’ de facto commercial court, dealing with the majority of commercial disputes on the islands.\textsuperscript{202}

Like the FCA, the FSD uses an individual docket system. Cases are assigned, upon filing, by the FSD’s registrar, in consultation with the Chief Justice,\textsuperscript{203} to an FSD judge, who will “adjudicate the trial of the matter and every interlocutory application arising before or after the trial of the matter.”\textsuperscript{204} This procedure accomplishes two goals. First, it reduces the risk of judicial manipulation\textsuperscript{205} by ensuring that an independent registrar allocates cases amongst the commercial judges, whilst guaranteeing some judicial involvement through the need to consult with the Chief Justice. Secondly, the docket system allows the judge to become more intimately involved in the case, forcing the parties to concentrate on key issues and facts, and allowing for an expedited interlocutory and trial process.\textsuperscript{206}

At present, there are 7 FSD judges, with appointments made by the Cayman Islands Governor, on the advice of the Judicial and Legal Services Commission.\textsuperscript{207} Like the SICC, there is no requirement for FSD judges to be from the Cayman Islands. Instead, applications can be made from lawyers throughout the Commonwealth, provided that

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{itemize}
\item[200] Cayman Islands Grand Court Rules 1995 (Revised Edition 1 July 2013) O.72, r. 1(2).
\item[201] Central Intelligence Agency, above n 281.
\item[202] Jeremy Walton “Guide to the Legal System in the Cayman Islands” (September 2013) Appleby Global <www.applebyglobal.com> at 4. For this reason, judges in the FSD are officially called “commercial judges”. See Cayman Islands Grand Court Rules 1995 (Revised Edition 1 July 2013) O.5, r. 1(7).
\item[203] Cayman Islands Grand Court Rules 1995 (Revised Edition 1 July 2013) O.5, r. 1(7).
\item[204] Cayman Islands Grand Court Rules 1995 (Revised Edition 1 July 2013) O.4, r. 2(2).
\item[205] For a more detailed discussion see Butler, above n 166.
\item[207] The Constitution of the Cayman Islands, s 106(1). See also Ian Hendry and Susan Dickson British Overseas Territories Law (Hart Publishing, Oxford, 2011) from 98.
\end{itemize}
\end{footnotesize}
they have been qualified for over ten years. Interestingly, whilst full-time judges of the Grand Court may also be appointed to the FSD part-time, Associate Judges can be appointed to sit solely in the FSD.

The result is a highly successful commercial court, in a very small common law jurisdiction. Although it costs CI$15,000 (approximately NZ$21,000) to lodge a case in the FSD, more than 150 cases have been filed every year since its inception – a substantial number given that only 480 civil cases were filed in 2008, the year before the FSD was established.

E Summary

As can be seen from this brief review of just four jurisdictions and five courts, the manner and degree of specialisation is varied. At one extreme, Singapore’s planned SICC involves a specialist court comprised of a mixture of domestic and foreign judges, with appeals going to a specialist Court of Appeal. At the other end sits the New South Wales Supreme Court’s specialist lists, staffed by quasi-specialist judges who are still expected to hear a variety of cases outside their specialist areas. Nonetheless, from this variety, several conclusions can be drawn.

First, the extent of any court’s specialist jurisdiction is a policy decision that must be made on a country-by-country basis according to both the needs of the commercial community, and the available judicial resources. It would be inappropriate, therefore, for the government to simply adopt another court’s specialist model in the hope that it will work in the New Zealand context.

Secondly, apart from the SICC, all judges are expected to work outside their specialist area. If England’s specialist judges are not required to work full-time in the Commercial Court, then one can hardly expect that New Zealand will have sufficient cases to justify a separate court staffed by wholly specialist judges. Specialisation, therefore, must be within the existing High Court structure.

---

208 Cayman Islands Government “Job Description – Grand Court Judge, Financial Services Division” Judicial and Legal Services Commission <www.judicialandlegalservicescommission.ky> at 3.
209 Cayman Islands Government “Job Description – Grand Court Judge, Financial Services Division (Part-time)” Judicial and Legal Services Commission <www.judicialandlegalservicescommission.ky> at 1.
210 See Hudson, above n 206, at 1; and Peter Hayden “Holding Court” (2010) 160 NLJ 182.
211 Cayman Islands Court Fees Rules 2009, sch 1, pt B.
In saying this, it is clear that there must be scope for specialist divisions or panels to adopt their own procedures, independently of the existing High Court rules. As the English Commercial Court’s experience in the 1960s reveals, the existence of specialist judges is only a minor part of the picture. Specialisation only succeeds if the court procedures underpinning it reflect the commercial community’s requirements.

Finally, specialisation must be seen as a dynamic process. As the continuous reforms of the New South Wales commercial list and English Commercial Court reveal, the business community’s needs change over time. At the very least, New Zealand should establish a court user committee, to ensure a steady stream of dialogue between judges and court participants.

VI The potential effects of specialisation in New Zealand

Although specialisation has been successful in other countries, this provides only a limited guarantee as to its success in New Zealand. Accordingly, this section briefly considers the costs and benefits of specialisation, before highlighting some additional features that must be considered if specialisation is to be introduced to the Zealand High Court.

A General advantages and disadvantages of specialisation

1 Advantages offered by specialisation

As Adam Smith observed in 1776, increased familiarity breeds increased efficiency.\(^\text{213}\) Whereas generalist judges require time and effort to bring themselves ‘up to speed’, specialist judges will already have a solid background knowledge of either the law or facts, driving several efficiency gains.\(^\text{214}\) As Michael Black, a former FCA Chief Justice, argued:\(^\text{215}\)

> No doubt we can all work out the right result if we have time, but where a decision in a technical area has to be made on the spot … it is best to have a judge who can give the case the immediate, almost instinctive, attention that it requires.

\(^\text{213}\) See generally Adam Smith An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations (1776).
\(^\text{215}\) Letter from Michael Black (Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Australia) to Bruce Robertson (President of the Law Commission) regarding judicial specialisation (August 2003), cited in Law Commission Delivering Justice for All, above n 103, at 266.
Where the judge already has an intimate knowledge of the law and issues involved, trials will become shorter, and judgments released more quickly, significantly reducing the transaction costs associated with litigation. This benefits both litigants and the state, as specialist judges can handle larger caseloads, shortening the time taken to get a case before court, and reducing the need to appoint more judges.\textsuperscript{216}

Specialists are also said to write better quality judgments, containing fewer “accidental errors.”\textsuperscript{217} Instead of seeking background explanations, a specialist’s ability to ask both counsel and expert witnesses questions that go right to the heart of an issue, is likely to result in quality judgments that accurately balance policy considerations, and accord with the parties’ expectations.\textsuperscript{218}

Furthermore, specialist judgments often benefit from increased legitimacy, compared to their generalist counterparts. As one commentator observed, “[to] the extent that the opinion makes difficult trade-offs, affected parties may defer more to an expert’s judgment under the assumption that the judge ‘understands’ the stakes and the complexities of the field or industry.”\textsuperscript{219} As a result, judgments are less likely to be appealed, further reducing parties’ litigation costs.\textsuperscript{220}

Finally, specialisation is likely to foster consistency as fewer judges have a greater influence on the law and its development.\textsuperscript{221} In turn, this consistency facilitates commerce by reducing commercial parties’ transaction costs (both in developing a framework to avoid legal liability, and also helping parties to come to an agreement if a dispute arises).\textsuperscript{222} This may be reinforced through the development of a specialist bar, which has the potential to create further efficiencies.\textsuperscript{223}

2 \textit{Disadvantages of specialisation}

On the other hand, whilst specialist courts and judges may create a uniform and consistent body of case law, this is accompanied by a strong risk of stagnation. As the

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{216} Cheng, above n 214, at 549.
\item \textsuperscript{217} David Currie and Frank Goodman “Judicial Review of Federal Administrative Action: Quest for the Optimum Forum” (1975) 75 Colum L Rev 1 at 67.
\item \textsuperscript{218} Glazebrook, above n 7, at 537. See also Galbraith, above n 1, at 422.
\item \textsuperscript{219} Cheng, above n 214, at 549.
\item \textsuperscript{220} Galbraith, above n 1, at 422.
\item \textsuperscript{221} Glazebrook, above n 7, at 537. See also Currie and Goodman, above n 217, at 63
\item \textsuperscript{222} Richardson, above n 1, at 129 and 133; and Galbraith, above n 1, at 420. For further discussion of this issue see Kerr, above n 51.
\item \textsuperscript{223} Glazebrook, above n 7, at 537. See also Grant, above n 58, where he argues that “[s]pecialist Courts attract specialist advocates and there is greater confidence for people to make use of such Courts.”
\end{itemize}
\end{footnotesize}
Chief Justice of Australia, Robert French, stated “one of [law’s greatest] strengths … is the facility it offers to cross-fertilise concepts and approaches from one area to another.”\(^{224}\) The fear is that specialist judges risk losing sight of legal developments outside their particular field, resulting in arcane rulings, and decisions which fail to reflect societal developments.\(^{225}\)

This concern is amplified due to the “danger that a specialised panel which is too small and specialised may create a ‘club’ culture, promote a matching mythology of expertise among the profession, encourage monopolies and contain jurisprudence.”\(^{226}\) Faced with a small, and often deferential, specialist bar, specialist judges may become even more insular in their thinking, failing to consider the effects of their ruling on other areas of the law.\(^{227}\)

This has further consequences if specialist judges become emboldened, assertive or actively contemptuous. To the extent that specialist judges believe that the generalist Court of Appeal or Supreme Court is less knowledgeable than themselves, they may develop a “tendency to accord less authority” to the judicial hierarchy.\(^{228}\) Ironically, this may lead to uncertainty if specialist judges actively seek to avoid following appellate court decisions that they consider to be incorrectly decided.

Another frequently cited concern is the increased threat of interest group manipulation, or special interest capture.\(^{229}\) This manifests itself in two forms. First, because specialisation may lead to “the development of excessively comfortable relationships between judges and members of the specialist bar”,\(^{230}\) there is a risk of judicial capture, with a small group of lawyers wielding substantial influence.

---

\(^{225}\) See Cheng, above n 214, at 552; and Lawrence Baum “Probing the Effects of Judicial Specialization (2009) 58 Duke LJ 1667 at 1678.

\(^{227}\) See, for example, Baum, above n 225, at 1679; and Ellen Jordan “Specialized Courts: A Choice?” (1981) 76 Northwestern University Law Review 745 at 747 – 748.

\(^{228}\) Baum, above n 225, at 1678.

\(^{229}\) Baum, above n 225, at 1677; and Jordan, above n 227, at 747 – 748; Glazebrook, above n 7, at 538; Cheng, above n 214, at 551 – 552; and Dreyfuss, above n 224, at 379.

\(^{230}\) Curthoys, above n 224, at 8. See also Baum, above n 225, at 1679.
Secondly, if a small category of litigants will often appear before the court, they have a strong incentive to lobby for the appointment of judges favourable to their cause.\(^{231}\)

Finally, specialisation comes with increased financial costs. Litigants may engage in jurisdictional conflicts in an attempt to get their case in or out of a specialist court, whilst the courts themselves need to be staffed and well resourced.\(^{232}\) Given New Zealand’s relatively small economy, these costs may outweigh any efficiency benefits specialisation provides.

B Further considerations

The difficulty, however, that one faces when examining these considerations is that “[t]he existing scholarship provides only a fragmentary understanding of the extent to which the potential effects of judicial specialisation – positive, negative, or mixed – actually occur.”\(^{233}\) Moreover, the extent and relevance of many of these factors is enormously dependent upon the form of specialisation introduced. Thus, even if certain effects can be shown in relation to one court, there is little guarantee that these will eventuate in another situation.

Nevertheless, there are two key considerations that are of particular importance to the current commercial specialisation debate. First, New Zealand is not a large country. It has a limited pool of judicial resources, and only so many commercial disputes. Accordingly, any attempt to introduce a commercial court or specialist panel must define the scope of its jurisdiction in a way which, first, protects it against sudden fluctuations\(^{234}\) and, secondly, is sufficiently narrow so as to enable the efficiency gains from specialisation to be realised.

This is of added importance if the specialisation occurs at High Court level for several reasons. First, High Court judges are not cheap. In a figure that has undoubtedly risen since its 2006 calculation, it was estimated that each High Court judge costs in excess of $630,000 per annum.\(^{235}\) Moreover, due to their guaranteed security of tenure,\(^{236}\)

---

\(^{231}\) Cheng, above n 214, at 551; and Sarang Vijay Damle “Specialize the Judge, Not the Court: A Lesson from the German Constitutional Court” (2005) 91 Va L Rev 1267 at 1283.

\(^{233}\) Baum, above n 225, at 1680.

\(^{234}\) Cheng, above n 214, at 555. See also Katz, above n 1, at 44.

\(^{235}\) See John Hansen, Judge of the High Court of New Zealand “Courts Administration, the Judiciary and the Efficient Delivery of Justice” (F.W. Guest Memorial Lecture, Otago University, Dunedin, 28 September 2006) at 1: “It is estimated that each High Court Judge, with necessary support staff, they cannot be removed even if there is insufficient work to justify their appointment. Accordingly, if judges were appointed, on the basis of their commercial experience, to a court or panel that subsequently failed to attract cases, the government will be required to bear the expense of an unwanted, and expensive, judicial asset. On the other hand, if the introduction of a specialist court leads to a substantial influx of commercial cases, this may place pressure on the current statutory limit of 55 judges, potentially resulting in delays to non-commercial cases, if insufficient judges are assigned to sit on regular civil and criminal trials.

Secondly, the judicial specialisation debate needs to be seen in context. Since the Supreme Court’s establishment in 1841, New Zealand’s judiciary has been characterised by its generalist nature. The High Court has never sat in divisions and its judges have successfully withstood numerous calls for increased judicial specialisation throughout its history. The danger is that once New Zealand goes down the path of specialisation, it will be very difficult to return to a generalist structure.

Take, for example, the Maori Land Court. With a heritage dating back to 1862, the Court was established “to ensure ownership, use and disposal of Maori land.” Although its function shifted from facilitating European purchase of Maori land during the 19th century, to resolving disputes between Maori with collective ownership of land, by 1980 a Royal Commission, considered that “its life [was] running out.” In a view shared by “most, if not all of those with the greatest knowledge and experience of the Court”, the Commission reported that:

---

236 Constitution Act 1986, s 23.
237 Judicature Act 1908, s 4(1)(b). This limit is set to be reaffirmed by s 6A(1) of the Judicature Modernisation Bill.
238 I accept that the High Court’s Administrative Division operated between 1968 and 1991, however, this is more akin to a specialist panel, rather than a division. This can be contrasted with the formal separation between the Chancery, Queen’s Bench and Family divisions in the England and Wales High Court, and the Common Law and Equity divisions in the New South Wales Supreme Court.
244 Report of the Royal Commission of Inquiry on the Maori Land Court, above n 241, at 74 (emphasis added).
It is hard to see that a separate court will be needed to do the remaining judicial work which could then perhaps be handled within the central court structure ...

Nevertheless, more than 30 years on, the Maori Land Court remains in existence, providing a vivid example of just how difficult it can be to remove a specialist panel or court.

This concern is two-fold. First, any move to introduce a specialist commercial panel, division or court is likely to result in lobbying for further specialisation in other legal areas. Taken to an extreme, this may result in the division of the Court’s jurisdiction into a series of panels, as has happened with the FCA. Secondly, even if the specialist commercial panel, division or court failed to live up to expectations it may, as the Maori Land Court shows, prove very difficult to remove.

Unfortunately, as the following sections reveal, neither the government nor the Law Commission considered these factors in any detail when designing the proposed reform under clause 18 of the Judicature Modernisation Bill.

VII The Judicature Modernisation Bill

A Law Commission report

In its 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, the Law Commission strongly supported the introduction of a specialist High Court commercial panel. Unfortunately, as this paper reveals, the Commission’s reasons for change are unable to withstand scrutiny, whilst its lack of detailed recommendations on the proposed panel’s operation has led to many of the problems created by clause 18 of the Judicature Modernisation Bill.

1 The rationale for change

Two factors underpinned the Commission’s decision to recommend greater High Court specialisation: the failure of the commercial list, and a perceived loss of commercial litigation. Neither provides a solid basis for the Commission’s recommendations.
(a) Commercial List’s failure

Introduced by the government in 1987, the commercial list provides for commercial judges, as appointed by the Chief Justice, to determine the parties’ pre-trial applications, with a view to identifying the main issues and reducing the scope of the substantive dispute.\textsuperscript{245} Although the list initially proved popular, its case load declined substantially over the past decade, leading the Commission to conclude that it had “[lost] its purpose,”\textsuperscript{246} and was “slowly falling into disuse.”\textsuperscript{247} Three factors were seen as contributing to the list’s demise.

First, and most importantly, the commercial list suffered from a “fundamental weakness”\textsuperscript{248} in that it only addresses pre-trial applications. Following the determination of pre-trial issues, cases returned to the general list, where there was no guarantee of a commercial judge determining the substantive dispute.\textsuperscript{249}

Secondly, the introduction of general case management\textsuperscript{250} significantly reduced the list’s \textit{procedural} benefits, to the point whereby quintessentially commercial disputes were potentially refused entry onto the list due to “disadvantages [of] cost and convenience.”\textsuperscript{251}

Finally, because the list only operates in Auckland,\textsuperscript{252} this led to substantial and “unjustified” increases in cost and travel for litigants based elsewhere.\textsuperscript{253} This is “particularly [unsatisfactory] given that some of the significant commercial litigation is against Crown entities, which are usually based in Wellington.”\textsuperscript{254}

\textsuperscript{245} Law Commission 2012 \textit{Review of the Judicature Act 1908}, above n 34, at [7.4]. See also Andrew Beck “Do we need the Commercial List?” [2002] NZLJ 441.
\textsuperscript{246} Law Commission 2012 \textit{Issues Paper}, above n 32, at [7.14].
\textsuperscript{247} Law Commission 2012 \textit{Issues Paper}, above n 32, at [7.34].
\textsuperscript{248} Law Commission 2012 \textit{Issues Paper}, above n 32, at [7.31]. See also Galbraith, above n 1, at 424.
\textsuperscript{249} Law Commission 2012 \textit{Issues Paper}, above n 32, at [7.31]. Indeed, the Law Commission went further and stated “having got the case ready for hearing … to then beat a retreat to the general list along with a myriad of other cases is inappropriate.”
\textsuperscript{250} For further discussion see Winkelmann and others, above n 104.
\textsuperscript{252} This has recently changed with judges based in the Wellington High Court being appointed to the commercial list in 2011. See Winkelmann “2013 High Court Annual Report”, above n 72, at 4.
\textsuperscript{253} Law Commission 2012 \textit{Issues Paper}, above n 32, at [7.32].
\textsuperscript{254} Law Commission 2012 \textit{Issues Paper}, above n 32, at [7.32].
(b) Loss of litigation

The Commission also concluded that the commercial list’s failure, coupled with ADR’s rising popularity, had led to a “respectable ‘bleeding off’ of commercial litigation” in New Zealand. Acting as a catalyst for change, the Commission concluded that, without reform, “[it] is difficult not to see that trend continuing”.

(c) Criticism

Whilst it is undoubtedly true that the commercial list has “[lost] its purpose”, and is “slowly falling into disuse”, this does not mean that commercial litigation is not going to the High Court. Instead, all that one can say is that commercial parties no longer see any use for a procedure that assigns a specialist judge to manage a case’s pre-trial applications, but returns it to the general list for the substantive hearing.

Secondly, there is no empirical evidence to support the Commission’s conclusion that “there has been a respectable ‘bleeding off’ of civil litigation” Nor, is there any basis for the Commission’s statement that, without reform, “[it] is difficult not to see that trend continuing”. In effect, the Commission never even satisfied the first of the three criteria established earlier in this paper, let alone showed that the ‘lost’ litigation was being resolved offshore or in ADR, and the substantial reason for this was the High Court’s lack of specialisation.

1 Commercial panels

Nevertheless, following its conclusion that change was required, the Commission examined four options for reform: (a) abolish the commercial list; (b) extend the commercial list to Wellington and Christchurch, and cover substantive hearings; (c) create a specialist commercial court in Auckland; or (d) introduce a High Court panel system.

255 Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.54]
256 Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.55].
258 Law Commission 2012 Issues Paper, above n 32, at 7.34.
259 Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.54]
Whilst an expanded commercial list, and specialist commercial court were considered to offer some benefits, the Law Commission strongly favoured the introduction of a panel system for the following reasons.

First, the prospect of trial court specialisation garnered widespread enthusiasm amongst commercial parties and their lawyers. In particular, the New Zealand Law Society’s strong support for a commercial panel was echoed by the results of a New Zealand Bar Association survey which found that 84% of its members supported judicial specialisation of some form.

Secondly, the Commission concluded that a panel system, which had received “general support” in Australia, represented a “pragmatic half-way house between an (unaffordable) commercial court and a wholly generalist jurisdiction.”

Finally, whilst the Commission accepted that there was no practical difference between a commercial panel, and extending the commercial list to cover substantive disputes, “it is the scope to develop further panels in the panel system that sets them apart, and makes us inclined to prefer it.” As noted earlier, this statement is particularly concerning when viewed in light of the High Court’s longstanding history as a generalist court, and the difficulties one faces when attempting to remove specialist panels and Courts.

2 Lack of recommendations

Unfortunately, having reached its conclusion, the Commission provided little guidance on the size, composition and scope of the proposed commercial panel, stating that this would “need to be settled”. Underpinning the Commission’s reluctance to offer detailed recommendations was its (unexplained) belief that legislation should simply provide for the Attorney-General, in consultation with the

---

264 Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.29].
265 Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.37].
267 Law Commission 2012 Issues Paper, above n 32, at [7.60].
268 Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.68].
Chief High Court Judge (CHCJ), to establish the commercial panel through subsequent Orders in Council. This is highly unsatisfactory for two reasons.

First, having discussed the current problems facing New Zealand’s judiciary, the Commission effectively abdicated any responsibility for improving the situation. Take, for example, the two major features of any commercial panel: the scope of its jurisdiction, and the membership of its judges. Both features are likely to be of paramount importance to any panel’s success. If the panel’s scope is too narrow, or the appointed judges lack the requisite expertise or experience, the panel is likely to fail. Yet the Commission never addressed the issue of judicial appointment/selection, and only briefly commented on the panel’s scope by suggesting that the London Commercial Court’s jurisdiction would be “a useful starting point for consideration”.

Like suggesting a cake but without providing the recipe, the result is a solution that is entirely lacking in substance. There is no guarantee of an improved civil litigation environment, or even an improvement upon the existing commercial list. In contrast, had the Commission attempted to define the commercial panel’s jurisdiction, and set guidelines around its operation, commercial parties, lawyers and judges would have had an opportunity to comment and suggest improvements, dramatically increasing the likelihood of successful reform.

Secondly, the Commission’s failure to provide distinct recommendations effectively forestalled detailed Parliamentary scrutiny of the panel’s scope and operation. The problem is neatly encapsulated by Phil Goff MP during the Bill’s first reading when he stated: “[my] experience of the Law Commission is that it does its homework … and that we can be confident that the basis of this legislation will be sound.”

Faced with a Bill over 1,000 pages long, in an area unlikely to draw much, if any, public attention, it would appear that MPs treated the Law Commission’s report with

269 Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.67].
271 Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.68].
272 See, for example, Ministry of Justice Report of the Ministry of Justice to the Justice and Electoral Committee on the Judicature Modernisation Bill (April 2014) at [61] which “recommend[s] that the panel approach set out in [clause 18] be retained. Even though submitters’ support for a commercial panel was divided, this mechanism will assist the High Court to be most relevant to its users. This aids the legitimacy of the Court, regardless of whether there is any real difference in decision-making.” (emphasis added).
273 (5 December 2013) 695 NZPD 15311.
deference, focusing instead upon areas where the government differed from the Commission. This has resulted in a failure to consider the potentially serious issues, as detailed below, which may result from the Bill’s current ‘bare bones’ approach.

B The Judicature Modernisation Bill

Following its introduction on 27 November 2013, the Judicature Modernisation Bill has attracted wide cross-party support, passing its first reading unanimously, and ‘sailing’ through the Select Committee with limited alterations. Barring any significant changes of heart, the Bill is likely to progress into law when Parliament resumes following the September election. Accordingly, the current formulation of clause 18, as amended by the Select Committee, is of considerable importance.

18 Panels

(1) The commercial panel of the High Court from which Judges may be selected to hear and determine commercial proceedings is established and may operate subject to this section.

(2) The Governor-General may, by Order in Council made on the recommendation of the Attorney-General after consultation with the Chief Justice and the Chief High Court Judge,—

(a) specify a commencement date for the operation of the commercial panel:

(b) specify the types of proceedings that may be assigned to the commercial panel:

(c) if the Governor-General considers it necessary, provide for the commercial panel to cease its operations on or from a specified date.

(3) The Chief High Court Judge, in consultation with the Attorney-General and the Chief Justice, may establish other panels of High Court Judges for the purposes of dealing with proceedings other than commercial proceedings.

(4) The Chief High Court Judge may determine how many High Court Judges are to be on the commercial panel or any other panel and assign Judges to the panels.

(5) The Chief High Court Judge may decide the basis on which cases are to be distributed as between Judges on the commercial panel or another panel and Judges who are not on any panel.

274 For example (5 December 2013) 695 NZPD 15312 per Phil Goff (Labour).

275 The only change made by the Select Committee to clause 18 was to re-write cl 18(6) from its original “The Chief High Court Judge may decide any other matters of practice or procedure relating to the commercial panel or other panels that are not prescribed or provided for by the High Court Rules.” Judicature Modernisation Bill 2013 (178 – 1).
(6) A party may nominate that the party’s case be dealt with by a Judge on a panel and the Chief High Court Judge may assign to the case a Judge or Judges from a panel.

Several features are immediately noteworthy. First, the Bill provides little more than a rudimentary or ‘bare bones’ framework. Whilst the commercial panel “is established”, its commencement date, and more importantly its scope, will only be determined after the Bill is enacted and a subsequent Order in Council is issued. As previously noted, this is an unfortunate situation as it denies both the public, and MPs, the opportunity to scrutinise the panel’s operation to ensure that (a) constitutional safeguards remain; and (b) the panel will actually improve New Zealand’s commercial litigation ‘problem’.

Secondly, the Bill attempts to reduce executive influence by granting the CHCJ significant control over the panel’s operation. Thus, once the panel is established, the CHCJ has control over both the number, and appointment, of judges to the panel, and the subsequent assignment of panel (and non-panel) judges to panel cases.

Finally, clause 18(3) vests the CHCJ with the power to establish non-commercial panels, following consultation with the Attorney-General and Chief Justice, thereby allowing further specialisation within the High Court.

VIII Issues

Belying its simple construction, clause 18 has the potential to raise several constitutional issues. Whilst these concerns are (at present) hypothetical, this does not mean that they should be dismissed. Instead, if Parliament continues to progress the Bill, clause 18 should be substantially rewritten to reduce the risk of panel packing, and its current threat to judicial independence.

A Judicial independence

A fundamental principle of the rule of law, and defining feature of a free society, judicial independence is necessary for judges to decide without “fear or favour, 278 Judicial Modernisation Bill (178 -2), cl 18(1) and (2).

277 See, for example, (5 December 2013) 695 NZPD 15299 where Judith Collins MP stated that “[j]udicial independence will be maintained through judicial control of case allocation and judge assignment to the panel.”

affection or ill will”. Although statutes such as the Constitution Act 1986 have traditionally focused on the protection of judges from executive or legislative influence, judicial independence extends beyond separation of powers concerns.

As Simon Shetreet stated “[it] must also encompass internal independence, namely, the independence of the judge from his or her judicial colleagues or superiors.” Although this individual independence may be safeguarded in several ways, it receives its greatest support from the legislative principle that all High Court judges have power over all of the court’s jurisdiction. In line with New Zealand’s generalist tradition, this provision ensures equality amongst the judges, providing that none shall “rank” higher than another. Clause 18 threatens to undermine this principle in three respects.

1 Judicial hierarchy

First, the practical effect of establishing a commercial panel is a reduction in non-panel judges’ jurisdiction. Whilst all High Court judges remain competent to adjudicate commercial matters, only commercial panel judges will experience commercial work. In contrast, under the existing commercial list, list judges preside over pre-trial disputes, but the case returns to the general list for its substantive hearing (where a non-list judge may be assigned). Assuming that judges enjoy working on commercial cases, clause 18 creates a judicial hierarchy whereby “all [judges] are equal, but [commercial panel judges] are more equal than others.”

280 Oaths and Declarations Act 1957, s18. See also Joseph, above n 278, at [20.3].
282 Shetreet, above n 167, at 3. See also Judges of the Supreme Court, Court of Appeal and High Court “Submission to the Justice and Electoral Committee on the Judicature Modernisation Bill” at [6], where they argued that: “The independence of judges when judging means that they must also be free of interference by other judges. In the High Court, each judge has been appointed to exercise all the jurisdiction of the Court. We expressed out concern to the Law Commission that a panel system which deprives some judges of part of the jurisdiction is potentially an erosion of the protection of independence in judging.”
283 For example, through random case allocation. See generally Butler, above n 166.
284 Judicature Act 1908, s 19. See also Judicature Modernisation Bill, cl 8; and Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.8].
285 Judicature Act 1908, s 19. See also Judicature Modernisation Bill, cl 8.
It is not difficult to see how this increase in specialisation may, among other things, lead to problems surrounding judicial promotion. Faced with a choice between two otherwise identical High Court judges, one who has worked solely upon general list cases, and another who, in addition to sitting on a specialist commercial panel, has been exposed to a wide variety of general list work, the choice will often be clear. Taken to an extreme, one may question whether a judge who was not ‘trusted’ to deal with High Court commercial cases, can be trusted to sit in the Court of Appeal or Supreme Court, where the consequences of an errant decision are far greater.

In many respects, this is of greater concern in New Zealand, than it is in any of the other jurisdictions surveyed above (apart from the Cayman Islands) for three reasons. First, whereas the New South Wales Supreme Court and England and Wales High Court have traditionally sat in divisions, New Zealand’s High Court has always been a court of generalists. Thus, because promotions up the judicial hierarchy have always taken into consideration the judge’s appointment to particular divisions, the existence of specialist lists and courts within these jurisdictions is of less concern than it is in a jurisdiction of generalists, such as New Zealand.

Secondly, because judges are assigned to multiple lists/panels in courts such as the New South Wales Supreme Court and the FCA, the risk of creating a judicial hierarchy is significantly reduced because the judges operate on a level playing field. Their specialities may be different, but none is exposed to all of the Court’s work. In contrast, the effect of clause 18 is to reduce the non-panel judges’ jurisdiction, whilst maintaining panel judges’ ability to sit on all cases.

Finally, unlike the FCA, where judges volunteer to be placed on panels, the fact that the CHCJ appoints panel judges under clause 18, could be seen as a promotion within the High Court, further undermining the principle that all judges are equal.

2 Concentration of power

This leads to the second, inter-related concern. In its attempt to remove any hint of executive influence over panel membership, the government provided the CHCJ with an untrammelled power to appoint judges to the commercial panel. Significantly, clause 18(4) contains no restrictions on the CHCJ’s powers. Thus, unlike the existing 287 See, for example, Judith Collins’ statement during the Bill’s first reading at (5 December 2013) 695 NZPD 15299; Ministry of Justice Report of the Ministry of Justice to the Justice and Electoral Committee (April 2014) at [63]; and Ministry of Justice Judicature Modernisation Bill – Initial Briefing (3 March 2014) at [18].

---

commercial list provisions,\textsuperscript{288} or many comparable jurisdictions,\textsuperscript{289} the CHCJ is under no obligation to consult with the Chief Justice, nor publish objective guidelines on the appointment process.

The risk of impropriety is clear. Where non-panel judges seek promotion to a panel, they face a potential incentive to ‘curry favour’ with the CHCJ by ruling in a particular manner, or behaving in a particular fashion.\textsuperscript{290} To the extent that commercial parties and their lawyers recognise the existence of this threat, public confidence in the judiciary is likely to be severely undermined. This is exacerbated by the fact that the CHCJ is under no obligation to justify panel appointments, meaning that any judicial impropriety is unlikely to be discovered or brought to account.

Admittedly, it is highly unlikely that the CHCJ will exercise his or her power inappropriately. Nevertheless, this concern only arises because of the government’s decision to place the power of appointment solely in the CHCJ’s hands. A more sensible approach (in line with the Senior Courts’ Judges’ submission\textsuperscript{291}) would be to require the Chief Justice’s concurrence on any appointment.\textsuperscript{292} Doing so has the advantage of keeping appointments within the Judiciary, thereby removing any hint of Executive influence, whilst providing an additional degree of scrutiny and arms-length appointment. Alternatively, the Bill could provide for judges to apply to be placed on these panels, coupled with a strong statement in Parliament that such applications should be accepted as a matter of course.

3 Judicial tenure

Finally, the Bill is silent on the removal of judges from the commercial panel. Nor is there any provision regarding the term of a judge’s assignment. The obvious inference, therefore, is that the CHCJ’s power to “assign” under clause 18(4), encompasses a further ability to reassign or remove judges from the panel.

\textsuperscript{288} Judicature Act 1908, s 24C.
\textsuperscript{289} For instance, s 6(2) of the Senior Courts Act 1981 (UK) requires the Lord Chief Justice to consult with the Lord Chancellor before making appointments to the English Commercial Court, whilst appointments to the FSD of the Cayman Islands Grand Court are made by the independent Judicial and Legal Services Commission, see Cayman Islands Government, above n 208.
\textsuperscript{290} See, for example, Kathy Mack, Sharyn Roach Anleu, and Anne Wallace “Caseload Allocation and Special Judicial Skills: Finding the ‘Right Judge’” (2012) 4(3) IJCA 68 at 75.
\textsuperscript{291} Judges of the Supreme Court, Court of Appeal and High Court, above n 282, at [6].
\textsuperscript{292} See also the provisions for appointment of commercial list judges under s 24C of the Judicature Act 1908.
Read in this light, clause 18 effectively provides for commercial panel judges to serve at the CHCJ’s pleasure. This is a somewhat startling conclusion. As far back as 1700, the English Parliament rejected the King’s ability to remove judges without reason. Yet that, in effect, is what clause 18 implies. When considered in light of the CHCJ’s already substantial powers of appointment and case management, it becomes immediately apparent that too much power has been concentrated in the hands of one person.

An appropriate solution would be to adopt the FCA’s approach, and appoint panel judges for a fixed term of, say, 3 years. Doing so has the advantage of reducing the CHCJ’s control over panel judges, whilst also providing a degree of job security not currently present in clause 18.

B Panel packing

In addition to the above concerns, the Bill poses a further threat of judicial manipulation or ‘panel packing’. Defined as “the deliberate allocation of one or more judges to a judicial panel in order to achieve a particular outcome”; panel packing compromises the parties’ right to a free and impartial trial, breaches the rule of law, and undermines public confidence in the judiciary. As such, it poses a significant threat to the judicial system, and ought to be actively guarded against. Unfortunately, the Bill does the opposite, facilitating judicial manipulation both within and outside the commercial panel.

1 Panel packing within the panel

Within the panel, threats of judicial manipulation are omnipresent due to the CHCJ’s complete control over the allocation of panel cases. Not only does the CHCJ have the power to determine the “basis on which cases are to be distributed”, but clause 18(6) expressly provides the CHCJ with the authority to directly assign panel judges on a case-by-case basis. To the extent that the CHCJ wishes to influence a result, the potential for manipulation is clear.

Unfortunately, as New Zealand’s only real attempt at specialisation reveals, this is not an idle concern. Between 1968 and 1991, the vast majority of public law cases 293 Act of Settlement 1700 (Eng) 12 & 13 Will III c 2. New Zealand adopted similar provisions in 1858 with the passage of the Supreme Court Judges Act 1858. For further discussion of this issue see Joseph, above n 278, at [21.3.2].

294 Law Commission 2012 Issues Paper, above n 32, at [7.60].
295 Butler, above n 166, at 85.
296 Butler, above n 166, at 86 – 87.
297 Judicature Modernisation Bill, cl 18(5).
(approximately 30 per annum) were sent to the High Court’s Administrative Division, where they were resolved by judges appointed by the Chief Justice. 298 As with clause 18, the Chief Justice had an unfettered power to allocate judges to panel cases. 299 As the following table reveals, the resulting distribution of cases leads to substantial concerns about the current drafting of clause 18.

Distribution of Administrative Division Cases (1968 – 1987)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Judge</th>
<th>Total number of Admin Div. cases decided</th>
<th>Years on the Administrative Division</th>
<th>Average number of cases per year</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Davison CJ</td>
<td>125</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>12.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Speight J</td>
<td>78</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wild CJ</td>
<td>75</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>7.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>White J</td>
<td>28</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>3.1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jeffries J</td>
<td>26</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>4.3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Casey J</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>6.3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>McMullin J</td>
<td>25</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>6.3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cooke J</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>[less than 1]</td>
<td>[more than 20]</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roper J</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chilwell J</td>
<td>19</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>3.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilson J</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>4.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Grieg J</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>5.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Holland J</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>3.3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bisson J</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>1.3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Woodhouse J</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>1.2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mahon J</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tompkins J</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>McGregor J</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Doogue J</td>
<td>0</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Other Judges</td>
<td>53</td>
<td>-</td>
<td>-</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Totals</td>
<td>556</td>
<td>93</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Of the 19 judges who were appointed to the Division between 1968 and 1987, 301 three judges heard and decided “fully half” of the Division’s cases. 302 Clearly, judicial case allocation was not random, and the Chief Justices’ exerted significant control over the

---

298 Legomsky, above n 270, at 51 – 54.
299 At the time the Administrative Division operated, the Chief Justice sat predominantly in the High Court. In this regard, they occupied a very similar role in relation to the Administrative Division as the CHCJ will under the proposed commercial panel.
300 Table sourced from Legomsky, above n 270, at 62.
301 Law Commission The Structure of the Courts (NZLC R7, 1989) at [468].
302 Legomsky, above n 270, at 60 – 66. See also Law Commission, above n 301, at [430].
Court’s business.\textsuperscript{303} Furthermore, the fact that both Chief Justices clearly favoured themselves when allocating cases shows the undesirability of placing the power of distribution in the hands of just one person.\textsuperscript{304} As Petra Butler correctly observed:

\begin{quotation}
Precisely because the make-up of a court can determine the outcome of a case, it is vital for litigants to have confidence that they have not lost a case because of decisions made to appoint a particular judge or judges to the case in order to produce a particular result.\textsuperscript{305}
\end{quotation}

This is in stark contrast to the FCA’s strictly random case allocation procedure, or the Cayman Islands’ FSD provisions which require the registrar to appoint judges to cases randomly (with a requirement to consult the Chief Justice). Ironically, if commercial parties or their lawyers observe, suspect, or perceive that panel packing is occurring within the commercial panel, threatening their ability to receive a fair and impartial trial, they may choose to resolve their dispute in offshore courts or through ADR. In this regard, clause 18’s current formulation has the potential to reduce, rather than bolster, the number of New Zealand High Court commercial cases.

2 \textit{Manipulation outside the commercial panel}

Clause 18 also threatens the provision of justice in non-commercial cases. Because panel judges will spend a disproportionately high proportion of their time presiding over commercial disputes, the rest of the High Court’s work will be disproportionately spread amongst the non-panel judges.\textsuperscript{306} Where the CHCJ wished to influence a particular area of law, for example sentencing lengths, it would be relatively easy for him or her to ‘stack’ the commercial panel with judges who favour tougher sentences. The remaining, less penal judges, would then have a greater influence upon sentencing policy, helping achieve the CHCJ’s aim of reducing sentencing lengths.

This risk is compounded by the CHCJ’s ability to establish new panels under clause 18(3), after consulting with the Attorney-General and the Chief Justice. This devolution of power represents a puzzling step by Parliament. Whilst it is true that courts such as the FCA introduced their specialist lists through Court practice directions, it is remarkable that in a generalist system, Parliament would expressly provide the CHCJ with the power to create new panels. Indeed, it seems odd that

\begin{flushleft}
\textsuperscript{303} Legomsky, above n 270, at 66.
\textsuperscript{304} See also Legomsky, above n 270, at 81.
\textsuperscript{305} Butler, above n 166, at 84.
\textsuperscript{306} The Law Commission stated that they should only spend 50\% of their time on panel cases. But this was subject to the CHCJ’s discretion: Law Commission \textit{2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908}, above n 34, at [10.69].
\end{flushleft}
Parliament granted the Executive control over the commercial panel’s commencement date, jurisdiction and termination, but is content to allow future panels develop with little to no statutory oversight.

Furthermore, the CHCJ’s duty to consult provides only a limited bulwark on his or her powers. So long as the CHCJ actually consults with the Attorney-General and Chief Justice on his or her plans to create a new panel, there is no obligation to follow their advice. Accordingly, as the clause currently stands, if the CHCJ wishes to influence another area of law, such as judicial review, there is almost nothing to prevent him or her from creating a panel to cover that topic, and appointing judges who share a similar view of the law in that area. Moreover, unlike the commercial panel, Parliament and the Executive have no ability to terminate the newly established panel except through new legislation.

Admittedly, the chances of a CHCJ deliberately assigning judges to the commercial panel to influence another area of law, or creating new panels to do just that, is very low. However, the consequences of panel packing are aggravated when judicial manipulation occurs in the High Court for two reasons. First, because many parties will be unwilling to file an appeal due to cost, time or other factors, judicially manipulated results will stand, compromising the judiciary’s integrity. Secondly, even if an appeal is lodged, this may be of little comfort to affected litigants because appellate court judges will generally remain bound by the High Court’s findings of fact. Accordingly, it is vital that steps are taken to prevent this non-random allocation of cases occurring.

3 Solution

To reduce the current risk of judicial manipulation under clause 18, three significant changes need to occur. First, judicial appointment to the panel should be done by the CHCJ, with the Chief Justice’s concurrence. Alternatively, the Bill could provide for judges to apply for appointment, coupled with a strong statement in Parliament that such applications should be accepted as a matter of convention. Secondly, the legislation should require commercial panel cases to be assigned randomly to panel

---

307 Judicature Modernisation Bill 2013, cl 18(2).
308 See, for example, R v Devon County Council, ex p Baker [1995] 1 All ER 73 (CA) at p 85 per Dillon LJ; approved by the New Zealand Court of Appeal in Lab Tests Auckland Ltd v Auckland District Health Board [2008] NZCA 385, [2009] 1 NZLR 776 at [314].
309 Compare cl 18(2)(c) with 18(3) of the Judicature Modernisation Bill 2013.
310 Butler, above n 166, at 86. See also Susan Willett Bird “The Assignment of Cases to Federal District Court Judges” (1975) 27 Stan L Rev 475 at 480.
judges, unless the CHCJ provides written reasons for allocating a specific judge. Thirdly, the CHCJ’s power to create new panels should be limited by the requirement to get both the Attorney-General’s and Chief Justice’s approval.

Ideally, however, clause 18 should be removed from the Bill, and made subject to a full Law Commission review.

IX Conclusion

This paper does not advocate for, or against, judicial specialisation in New Zealand. Instead, it seeks to put the issue in context, so that future reform is conducted in an appropriate fashion.

Although judicial specialisation (of different degrees) is prevalent in both large and small countries, each jurisdiction has different reasons for its introduction. While the FCA is concerned with judicial efficiency, economic justifications and the growth of the legal services industry are of primary importance for the SICC and English Commercial Court, with both Courts competing to attract litigants from around the world. The rationale behind the Cayman Islands’ FSD, on the other hand, lies in between these two extremes – it is designed to encourage efficiency, whilst maintaining the Islands’ position as a leading financial services destination.

In New Zealand, practitioners’ calls for judicial specialisation have centred on commercial litigants’ perceived loss of confidence in the generalist High Court. According to the Court’s detractors, commercial parties have become wary of generalist High Court judges’ abilities to understand the factual and legal nuances of their cases, and increasingly look towards offshore courts and ADR to resolve their disputes. The perceived result has been a substantial decline in commercial litigation, threatening the development of New Zealand’s commercial law, and potentially endangering its economic development, as offshore parties become reluctant to invest, and domestic parties face higher transaction costs when negotiating agreements.

Critics argue that moving to a specialist structure will remedy these problems. As commercial parties become more willing to entrust their dispute to the courts, New Zealand’s law will become more dynamic, enhancing our international legal reputation, and encouraging future economic development.

However, as the Law Commission correctly stated, “[i]t would not be sensible for any jurisdiction to introduce change into a quality generalist jurisdiction unless the need to do so can be properly demonstrated." This standard simply has not been met. As this paper highlights, there is no publically available evidence to support the claim that the High Court is losing its commercial jurisdiction. Nor is there any empirical data to suggest that commercial litigation is being systematically resolved by ADR or in offshore dispute resolution fora. This is a highly unsatisfactory state of affairs. This paper strongly argues that there can be no mandate to change a functioning and well-respected judiciary fundamentally until it can be shown that:

1. relative to historical trends and comparable jurisdictions, the High Court has ‘lost’ a significant proportion of its commercial jurisdiction (both in terms of numbers of cases filed, and types of cases heard and decided);
2. the ‘lost’ commercial cases are being resolved through ADR or in offshore fora; and
3. the primary reason for litigants’ movement away from the formal civil justice system is a lack of judicial specialisation.

Unfortunately, the government’s proposal to introduce a panel system to the High Court under clause 18 of the Judicature Modernisation Bill represents a significant threat to New Zealand’s legal system. As currently drafted, it endangers a litigant’s right to a fair and impartial trial, places too much power in the CHCJ’s hands, and threatens to undermine the principle of individual judicial independence.

Whilst the ideal solution would be to remove clause 18 pending a full Law Commission review, if the government continues to progress the Bill, Supplementary Order Papers should be introduced immediately to: (a) limit the CHCJ’s control over the panel by requiring the Chief Justice’s concurrence on all panel appointments; (b) provide panel judges with a 3 year tenure; (c) require all cases to be allocated randomly amongst panel judges; and (d) limit the CHCJ’s ability to create new panels by requiring him or her to get the approval of both the Chief Justice and Attorney-General.

311 Law Commission 2012 Review of the Judicature Act 1908, above n 34, at [10.41].
X Bibliography

A Legislation

1 New Zealand legislation

Arbitration Act 1996.

Commerce Act 1986.

Judicature Act 1908.

New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990.

Oaths and Declarations Act 1957.

Supreme Court Judges Act 1858.

2 Foreign Legislation

Act of Settlement 1700 (Eng) 12 & 13 Will III c 2.

Administration of Justice Act 1970 (UK).

Commercial Causes Act 1903 (NSW).

The Constitution of the Cayman Islands.

Federal Court of Australia Act 1976 (Cth).

Senior Courts Act 1981 (UK).

Supreme Court Act 1970 (NSW).

Supreme Court of Judicature Act (Singapore, cap 322, 2007 rev ed).
3  International Material

4  Bills

Judicature Modernisation Bill 2013 (178 – 1).

5  Regulation

B  Parliamentary Material

1  Hansard

(5 December 2013) 695 NZPD 15299 – 15314.

2  Select Committee Reports and Submissions

Bell Gully “Submission to the Justice and Electoral Committee on the Judicature Modernisation Bill”.

Buddle Findlay “Submission to the Justice and Electoral Committee on the Judicature Modernisation Bill”.

Jack Hodder “Submission to the Justice and Electoral Committee on the Judicature Modernisation Bill”.

Judges of the Supreme Court, Court of Appeal and High Court “Submission to the Justice and Electoral Committee on the Judicature Modernisation Bill”.

Ministry of Justice Judicature Modernisation Bill – Initial Briefing (3 March 2014).

New Zealand Bar Association “Submission to the Justice and Electoral Committee on the Judicature Modernisation Bill”.

New Zealand Law Society “Submission to the Justice and Electoral Committee on the Judicature Modernisation Bill”.

C Cases

1 New Zealand cases

Benjamin Developments v Jones [1994] 3 NZLR 189 (CA).

Clear Communications Ltd v Telecom Corporation of New Zealand Ltd (1992) 5 TCLR 166 (HC).

Danone Asia Pacific Holdings Pte Ltd v Fonterra Co-Operative Group Ltd [2014] NZHC 1681.

Ironsands Investments Ltd v Toward Industries Ltd [2012] NZHC 1277.

2 Foreign cases

Amin Rasheed Shipping Company Corp v Kuwait Insurance Co [1983] 1 WLR 228 (CA).

Peter Cassidy Seed Co Ltd v Osuustukkauppa IL [1957] 1 WLR 273 (QB).

Kirin-Amgen Inc v Hoechst Marion Roussel Ltd [2005] 1 All ER 667 (HL).

Parke-Davis & Co v H K Mulford & Co 189 F 95, 115 (SDNY, 1911).

Prest v Petrodel Resources Ltd and others [2013] UKSC 34, [2013] 2 AC 415.

R v Devon County Council, ex p Baker [1995] 1 All ER 73 (CA).

D Court Rules and Practice Notes

1 New Zealand

District Court Rules 2009.

High Court Rules.

2 Australia

Federal Court of Australia, Practice Note CM 1 – Case Management and the Individual Docket System, 1 August 2011.

Federal Court Rules 2011 (Cth).

3  Singapore

4  United Kingdom

Civil Procedure Rules Practice Direction 58 – Commercial Court (UK).

Civil Procedure Rules Practice Direction 59 – Mercantile Courts (UK).

5  Cayman Islands

Cayman Islands Court Fees Rules 2009.

Cayman Islands Grand Court Rules 1995 (Revised Edition 1 July 2013).

E  Official Reports

1  Royal Commission Reports

2 Law Commission Reports and Issues Papers

3 New Zealand Government and Court Reports

K Saville-Smith and R Fraser Alternative Dispute Resolution: General Civil Cases (Ministry of Justice, Wellington, 2004).

4 Foreign Reports

F Books and Chapters in Books

Buddle Findlay Quest for Efficient Justice: What does the New Zealand Business Community Expect of our Judicial System (September 2002).

Commercial Law in New Zealand (online looseleaf ed, LexisNexis).

Jim Farmer “Civil Litigation in Crisis” in New Zealand Bar Association Civil Litigation in Crises – What Crisis (February 2008).

McGechan on Procedure (online looseleaf ed, Westlaw).

New Zealand Bar Association Civil Litigation in Crisis – What Crisis (February 2008).

G Articles

Grant Morris “Towards a History of Mediation in New Zealand’s Legal System” (2013) 24 Australasian Dispute Resolution Journal 86.

Ivor Richardson “Law and Economics” (1998) 4 NZBLQ 64.

John Doyle “Imagining the past, remembering the future: the demise of civil litigation” (2012) 86 ALJ 240.

Peter Hayden “Holding Court” (2010) 160 NLJ 182.

Rachel Laing, Saskia Righarts, Mark Henaghan A Preliminary Study on Civil Case Progression Times in New Zealand (University of Otago Legal Issues Centre, Faculty of Law, 15 April 2011).

Sarang Vijay Damle “Specialize the Judge, Not the Court: A Lesson from the German Constitutional Court” (2005) 91 Va L Rev 1267.

Tony Molloy “New Zealand: Cuckoos in the nest in an otherwise promising trust and investment jurisdiction” 201 Offshore Investment 19.

H Speeches

Andrew Greenwood, Judge of the Federal Court of Australia “Is there a Need for a Separate Corporations Court?” (speech to the Company Law Conference, Brisbane, 31 March 2008).

David L Kreider “A Corporate General Counsel’s Perspective on Arbitration” (speech to the Arbitrators’ and Mediators’ Institute of New Zealand, Auckland, 4 – 6 August 2011).

Helen Winkelmann, Chief High Court Judge of New Zealand “ADR and the Civil Justice System” (speech to the Arbitrators’ and Mediators’ Institute of New Zealand, Auckland, 6 August 2011).

J J Spigelman, Chief Justice of New South Wales, “Commercial Causes Centenary” (speech to the dinner held to celebrate 100 years since the commencement of the Commercial Causes Act 1903, Sydney, 6 November 2003).

J J Spigelman, Chief Justice of New South Wales, “Transaction Costs and International Litigation” (speech to the 16th Inter-Pacific Bar Association Conference, Sydney, 2 May 2006).

John Hansen, Judge of the High Court of New Zealand “Courts Administration, the Judiciary and the Efficient Delivery of Justice” (F.W. Guest Memorial Lecture, Otago University, Dunedin, 28 September 2006).

K Shanmugam, Singapore Minister for Law, “Addendum to the President’s Address to Parliament” (speech to the Parliament of Singapore, Singapore, 23 May 2014).

P A Bergin, Judge of the Supreme Court of New South Wales “Presentation of Commercial Cases in the Supreme Court of New South Wales” (speech to the LexisNexis Commercial Litigation Conference, 26 October 2005).
I Websites

Anthony Grant “If competition is so good, why can’t we have Courts that compete with each other” (9 September 2011) <www.anthonygrant.com>.

Cayman Islands Government “Job Description – Grand Court Judge, Financial Services Division (Part-time)” Judicial and Legal Services Commission <www.judicialandlegalservicescommission.ky>.

Cayman Islands Judicial and Legal Information Website “Court of Appeal” (5 April 2013) <www.judicial.ky>.

Chris Crowe “Singapore outlines ambitious plans for pre-eminence in dispute resolution” International Bar Association <www.ibanet.org>.

Courts of New Zealand “Annual Statistics” <www.courtofnz.govt.nz>

Grand Court of the Cayman Islands “Financial Services Division” (29 April 2013) Cayman Islands Judicial and Legal Information Website <www.judicial.ky>.

Mark Humphries “Choosing the Right Judges” (7 July 2011) Law Society Gazette <www.lawgazette.co.uk>.

Supreme Court of Singapore “Our Courts” (3 July 2014) <app.supremecourt.gov.sg>.

Te Kooti Whenua Maori “Maori Land Court” <www.justice.govt.nz>.

United Kingdom Ministry of Justice “Mercantile courts judges and their role” (18 February 2012) <www.justice.gov.uk>.

J Miscellaneous

“Obituary of Professor Sir Hugh Laddie” The Telegraph (online ed, London, 3 December 2008).