

Mental health impacts of coronavirus (COVID-19)

It's normal to feel stress and worry when there is a health event happening in the community that is affecting people's wellbeing, such as coronavirus disease (COVID-19).

This can affect any person in the community who is concerned about the infection, with more specific concerns arising for people being tested, people in quarantine and people who have received a diagnosis.

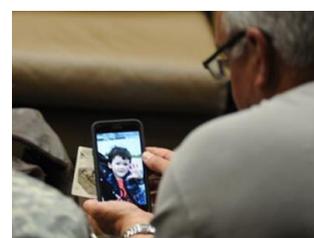

Family and friends can also experience similar mental health impacts.

Potential mental health impacts are:

- > increased anxiety for self and others (this can be expressed as a fear for one's own health, and a fear of infecting others)
- > psychological distress
- > perceived stigmatisation
- > social isolation
- > interruption to employment or study
- > impact on normal daily routine and functioning.

Isolation can be particularly challenging, below are some home practices to look after your mental health and wellbeing:

- > Maintain a daily routine as much as possible, including your normal sleep routine.
- > Stay connected with family and friends through technology e.g. Face to face Skype, Facetime and other technology can be helpful.
- > Look after your physical health through regular healthy meals. Most people in isolation will either have family, friends or services delivering regular meals.
- > Don't over-indulge in alcohol or comfort foods.
- > Beware of overexposure to news sources. Keeping informed can be helpful, but repeated bulletins about coronavirus may overwhelm.
- > Be aware that your mood may change and experience periods of sadness, anxiety, frustration and fear are common. Should these symptoms become severe or persistent then seek help.
- > As much as possible, continue doing activities at home that you enjoy.
- > Access internet or phone based support if you need.
